Q. You entruſted D'Abancourt, the nephew of Calonne, with the department of war; and ſuch has been the ſucceſs of your conſpiracy, that the poſts of Longwy and Verdun were ſurrendered to the enemy at the moment of their appearance—What have you to anſwer?

A. I did not know that D'Abancourt was M. Calonne's nephew; I have not cauſed the ſurrender of the poſts; I would not have conſented to their ſurrender; if they have been betrayed I know nothing of it.

Q. You have deſtroyed our navy—a vaſt number of officers belonging to that corps had emigrated, there ſcarcely remain any to do duty in the harbours; meanwhile Bertrand was granting them paſſports every day; and when the legiſlative body repreſented to you his criminal conduct on the eighth of March, you anſwered that you were ſatisfied with his ſervices—What have you to anſwer?

A. I have done all I could to retain the officers. As to M. Bertrand, ſince the legiſlative aſſembly preſented no complaint againſt him ſo ſpecific as to put him in a ſtate of accuſation, I did not think it proper to turn him out of office.

Q. You have favoured the maintenance of abſolute government in the colonies; your agents fomented troubles and counter-revolutions throughout them, which took place at the ſame epoch when it took place in France, which indicates plainly that your hand laid this plot—What have you to anſwer?

A. If there are any perſons who aſſume to be my agents, they do not ſpeak the truth; I had nothing to do with what you have juſt mentioned.

Q. The interior of the ſtate was convulſed by fanatics; you avowed yourſelf their protector, in manifeſting your evident intention of recovering by them your ancient power—What have you to anſwer?

A. I cannot anſwer to this; I know nothing of ſuch a project.

Q. The legiſlative body had paſſed a decree on the twenty-ninth of January, againſt the factious prieſts; you ſuſpended its execution—What have you to anſwer?

A. The conſtitution reſerved to me my free right to refuſe my ſanction of decrees.

Q. The troubles had encreaſed; the miniſter declared that he knew no means in the laws extant, to arraign the guilty. The legiſlative body enacted a new decree, which you likewiſe ſuſpended—What have you to anſwer?

A. I exerciſed no more than the right veſted in me by the conſtitution.

Q. The anti-civic conduct of the guards whom the conſtitution had granted you, had rendered it neceſſary to diſband them. The day after their diſſolution you ſent them a letter expreſſive of your ſatisfaction, and continued their pay. This fact is proved by the treaſurer of the civil-liſt—What have you to anſwer?

A. I only continued them in pay till freſh ones could be raiſed, according to the tenor of the decree.

Q. You kept near your perſon the Swiſs guards; the conſtitution forbade you this, the legiſlative aſſembly expreſsly ordained their departure—What have you to anſwer?

A. I have executed all the decrees that have been enacted in this reſpect.

Q. You had private companies at Paris, charged to operate movements uſeful to your projects of a counter-revolution. Dangremont and Gilles were two of your agents, who had ſalaries from the civil-liſt. The receipts of Gilles, who was ordered to raiſe a company of ſixty men, ſhall be preſented to you—What have you to anſwer?

A. I have no knowlege whatever of the projects laid to their charge; the idea of a counter-revolution never entered into my mind.

Q. You wiſhed to ſuborn, with conſiderable ſums, ſeveral members of the legiſlative and conſtituent aſſemblies. Letters from St. Leon and others evince the reality of theſe deeds—What have you to anſwer?

A. Several perſons preſented themſelves with ſimilar propoſals, but I have waved them.

Q. Who are they that preſented you thoſe projects?

A. The plans were ſo vague that I do not recollect them now.

Q. Who are thoſe to whom you gave money?

A. I gave money to nobody.

Q. You ſuffered the French name to be reviled in Germany, Italy, and Spain; ſince you omitted to demand ſatisfaction for the bad treatment which the French ſuffered in thoſe countries—What have you to anſwer?

A. The diplomatical correſpondence will prove the contrary; beſides this was a concern of the miniſters.

Q. You reviewed the Swiſs on the tenth of Auguſt, at five o'clock in the morning; and the Swiſs were the firſt who fired upon the citizens.

A. I went on that day to review all the troops that aſſembled about me; the conſtituted authorities were with me, the department, the mayor and municipality; I had even invited thither a deputation of the national aſſembly, and I afterwards repaired into the midſt of them with my family.

Q. Why did you draw troops to the caſtle?

A. All the conſtituted authorities ſaw that the caſtle was threatened; and as I was a conſtituted authority I had a right to defend myſelf.

Q. Why did you ſummon the mayor of Paris in the night between the ninth and tenth of Auguſt, to the caſtle?

A. On account of the reports that were circulated.

Q. You have cauſed the blood of the French to be ſhed.

A. No ſir, not I.

Q. You authoriſed Septeuil to carry on a conſiderable trade in corn, ſugar, and coffee at Hamburg. This fact is proved by a letter from Septeuil.

A. I know nothing of what you ſay.

Q. Why did you affix a veto on the decree which ordained the formation of a camp of twenty thouſand men?

A. The conſtitution left to me the free right of refuſing my ſanction to decrees; and even from that period I had demanded the aſſemblage of a camp at Soiſſons.

The preſident then addreſſed the convention: 'The queſtions are done with'—He then addreſſed Louis: 'Louis, is there any thing that you wiſh to add?

A. I requeſt a communication of the charges which I have heard, and of the pieces relating thereto, and the liberty of chooſing counſel for my defence.

Valaze, who ſat near the bar, then took up the papers, upon which particular articles of the accuſation were founded, read them ſeverally aloud, and preſented them as he read them to Louis, putting to him the queſtion 'Louis Capet, la reconnoiſſez vous?'—Louis do you acknowlege this paper? If the king anſwered in the affirmative, Valaze repeated aloud, as he laid the papers on the table, 'Louis reconnois,' or 'la piece eſt reconnu;' if he diſavowed it, he ſaid 'Louis ne la reconnoit pas,' or 'la piece n'eſt pas reconnu.' The firſt article preſented to Louis was, the memoir of Laporte and Mirabeau, and ſome others containing plans of a counter-revolution.

A. I diſown them.

Q. Letter of Louis Capet, dated June 29, 1790, ſettling his connexions with Mirabeau and Lafayette, to effect a revolution in the conſtitution.

A. I reſerve to myſelf to anſwer the contents.—(Valaze read the letter) — It is only a plan, in which there is no queſtion about a counter-revolution; the letter was not to have been ſent.

Q. Letter of Louis Capet, of the twenty-ſecond of April, relative to converſations about the Jacobins, about the preſident of the committee of finances, and the committee of domains; it is dated by the hand of Louis Capet.

A. I diſown it.

Q. Letter of Laporte of Thurſday-morning, March the third, marked in the margin, in the hand-writing of Lewis Capet, with 'March the third, 1791,' implying a pretended rupture between Mirabeau and the Jacobins.

A. I diſown it.

Q. Letter of Laporte without date, in his hand-writing, but marked in the margin by the hand of Lewis Capet, containing particulars reſpecting the laſt moments of Mirabeau, and expreſſing the care that had been taken to conceal from the knowledge of men, ſome papers of great concern which had been depoſited with Mirabeau.

A. I diſown it as well as the reſt.

Q. Plan of a conſtitution, or reviſion of the conſtitution, ſigned Lafayette, addreſſed to Lewis Capet, April the ſixth, 1790, marked in the margin with a line in his own hand-writing.

A. Theſe things have been blotted out by the conſtitution.

Q. Do you know this writing?

A. I do not.

Q. Your marginal comments?

A. I do not.

Q. Letter of Laporte, of the nineteenth of April, marked in the margin by Lewis Capet, 'April the nineteenth, 1791,' mentioning a converſation with Rivarol.

A. I diſown it.

Q. Letter of Laporte, marked April ſixteen, 1791, in which it ſeems complaints are made of Mirabeau, the abbé Perigord, André, and Beaumetz, who do not ſeem to acknowledge ſacrifices made for their ſake.

A. I diſown it likewiſe.

Q. Letter of Laporte of the twenty-third of February, 1791, marked and dated in the hand-writing of Lewis Capet; a memorial annexed to it, reſpecting the means of his gaining popularity.

A. I know neither of theſe pieces.

Q. Several pieces without ſignature, found in the caſtle of the Thuilleries, in the gap which was ſhut in the walls of the palace, relating to the expences to gain that popularity.

Preſident.—Previous to an examination on this ſubject, I wiſh to aſk a preliminary queſtion:—Have you cauſed to be conſtructed a preſs with an iron door in the caſtle of the Thuilleries, and had you your papers locked up in that preſs?

A. I have no knowledge of it whatever.

Q. Here is a day-book written by Lewis Capet himſelf, containing the penſions he has granted out of his coffer from 1776 till 1792, in which are obſerved ſome douceurs granted to Acloque.

A. This I own, but it conſiſts of charitable donations which I have made.

Q. Different liſts of ſums paid to the Scotch companies of Noailles, Gramont, Montmorency, and Luxemburgh, on the ninth of July, 1791.

A. This is prior to the epoch when I forbade them to be paid.

Preſident—Louis, where had you depoſited thoſe pieces which you own?

A. With my treaſurer.

Q. Do you know theſe penſion-liſts of the life-guards, the one hundred Swiſs, and the king's guards for 1792?

A. I do not.

Q. Several pieces relative to the conſpiracy of the camp of Jales, the originals of which are depoſited among the records of the department of L'Ardéche.

A. I have not the ſmalleſt knowledge of them.

Q. Letter of Bouillé, dated Mentz, bearing an account of nine hundred and ninety-three thouſand livres received of Lewis Capet.

A. I diſown it.

Q. An order for the payment of one hundred and ſixty-eight thouſand livres, ſigned Lewis, endorſed Le Bonneirs, with a letter and billet of the ſame.

A. I diſown it.

Q. Two pieces relative to a preſent made to the wife of Polignac, and to Lavauguyon and Choiſſeul.

A. I diſown them as well as the others.

Q. Here is a note ſigned by the two brothers of the late king, mentioned in the declaratory act. A. I know nothing of it.

Q. Here are pieces relating to the affair of Choiſſeul-Gouffier, at Conſtantinople.

A. I have no knowledge of them.

Q. Here is a letter of the late king to the biſhop of Clermont, with the anſwer of the latter, of the ſixteenth of April, 1791. A. I diſown it.

Preſident—Do you not acknowledge your writing and your ſignet? A. I do not.

Preſident—The ſeal bears the arms of France.

A. Several perſons made uſe of that ſeal.

Q. Do you acknowledge this liſt of ſums paid to Gilles? A. I do not.

Q. Here is a memorandum for indemnifying the civil liſt for the military penſions; a letter of Dufreſne St. Leon, which relates to it.

A. I know none of theſe pieces.

Theſe ſeveral interrogatories and exhibits having been gone through, the preſident ſaid—"Louis, I have no further queſtions to propoſe—have you any thing further to "add in your defence."

He replied with promptneſs and collection—"I deſire to have a copy of the accuſation, "and of the papers upon which it is founded. I alſo deſire to have counſel of my own "nomination."

The preſident Barrere informed him that the convention had already paſſed a decree authoriſing the two firſt points; that on the other he ſhould be informed in due time.

The decree was paſſed authoriſing the king to chuſe his own counſel; he applied firſt to Target, a diſtinguiſhed advocate of Paris, who urged that it was not conſiſtent with his principles to undertake the defence of royalty, that upon the merits of the accuſation, and trial in queſtion, he would not offer an opinion, but as he had never undertaken a cauſe in which he was not ſatisfied of its being founded on juſtice, he would not undertake the conſideration of the preſent, leſt by obeying the voice of conſcience ſhould he find it incompatible with his duty to defend it, his opinion might prejudice the cauſe. He finally choſe Meſſrs. Tronchet, Deſeze, and Lamoignon Maleſherbes.

On the fifteenth and ſixteenth of December, ſeveral decrees were paſſed authoriſing the printing of the documents, they were all laid on the table; the twenty-ſixth was appointed for hearing the king's defence.

The ſitting was accordingly opened at nine o'clock, and the galleries crowded with people; at ten he appeared at the bar attended by the mayor of Paris, generals Santerre and Berruyer, and his three counſel.

The preſident ſaid— "Louis, The national convention has decreed that you be heard this day finally in your defence, by yourſelf, your counſel, and ſuch evidence as you may wiſh to produce—be ſeated."

Louis then replied, "I have given it in charge to my counſel to ſpeak for me"— he turned to De Seze, who roſe and addreſſed the convention as follows:—

"Citizens, repreſentatives of the nation!

—"The moment is at length arrived, when Louis, accuſed in the name of the French people, and ſurrounded by counſel granted to him by humanity and the law, is about to enter on his defence!.....The ſilence which at preſent prevails, gives me reaſon to think that the day of juſtice has ſucceeded the days of prejudice. Unfortunate kings are entitled to more pity and more reſpect than the unfortunate in other ranks of life, and he who formerly occupied the moſt brilliant throne in the univerſe, muſt excite a ſtill greater degree of intereſt!.....

....."You have ordered him to appear before you—he has obeyed with calmneſs and dignity, emboldened by his innocence and ſupported by the teſtimony of his whole life. He has revealed to us even his thoughts!..... In diſcuſſing without preparation, and without mature examination, charges which he did not foreſee, and being obliged, as one may ſay, to make an extemporaneous defence; it was impoſſible for Louis not to declare to you his innocence!..... I ſhall demonſtrate it—I ſhall produce proper proofs; and I ſincerely wiſh that this hall could be inſtantly enlarged, that the multitude, who have received the moſt fatal impreſſions againſt Louis, might come hither to receive impreſſions of a contrary nature. Louis knows that Europe waits with anxiety for the ſentence you are about to paſs. He knows that it will be handed down to poſterity; but he conſiders only his cotemporaries..... like him, we forget poſterity, and look only to the preſent moment.

"Had I to addreſs only judges, I ſhould be ſatisfied with telling them, that ſince the nation has aboliſhed royalty, no farther ſentence can be pronounced againſt Louis; but I addreſs the people; I muſt examine the queſtion under two points of view; that in which Louis was placed before he accepted the conſtitution, and that in which he ſtood after he accepted it.

"In examining this ſubject, I firſt find the decree which enacts, that Lewis ſhall be tried by the conſtitution. Thoſe who framed that decree, undoubtedly ſaid that Louis could not ſhelter himſelf under his inviolability. What then have you done by that decree?

You have conſtituted yourſelves judges of that accuſation, which you yourſelves made. You have decreed alſo, that Louis ſhould be heard. If he ought then to be heard, he has a right to defend himſelf; the judge muſt not circumſcribe the means; the convention will examine them according to their juſt value when produced. If Louis deceives himſelf, you muſt refute his errors.

" Nations are ſovereign; They have a right to give themſelves whatever form of government they think proper. I ſhall not conteſt this principle, and it is not yet forgotten that the efforts of one of the counſel of Louis contributed to make it be inſerted in the conſtitution. But the nation itſelf cannot exerciſe its ſovereignty. It muſt, therefore, delegate the exerciſe of it. In 1789, the nation choſe a monarchical government——a monarchical government required inviolability in the chief; it was neceſſary he ſhould command the reſpect which enforces the obedience required by the law. The nature of this inviolability has been fully diſcuſſed. It has been pretended that it was not a ſynallagmatic contract; but the delegation of the ſovereignty was a contract as long as it was not revoked; it was a mandamus if you chooſe; but a mandatory could not ſubmit to other conditions, or other puniſhments than thoſe mentioned in the mandamus.

" On opening the ſecond chapter, under the article royalty, I find that the perſon of the king is inviolable; there is no exception, no modification whatever: But there are certain circumſtances in which the chief might loſe that character of inviolability. The firſt caſe is as follows;— . . .

' Art. V. § 1. Chap. ii. of the third title. If the king has not taken the oath, or ' if, after taking it, he retracts, he ſhall be conſidered as having abdicated the throne.' .... The nation here impoſes on the king the duty of taking the oath. To retract from this oath is a crime againſt the nation. The nation guarded againſt this crime, and appointed a puniſhment for it—I expreſs myſelf incorrectly—it was not a puniſhment—it was not a forfeiture; the word is not mentioned; it is only a ſuppoſition that the king ſhould be conſidered as having abdicated the throne. You ſee that the conſtitution eſtabliſhes no tribunal, that it ſpeaks not of trial, and that it does not pronounce the word forfeiture.

" The king, however, without retracting his oath, might betray it—he might favour criminal and hoſtile enterpriſes againſt the ſtate. The conſtitution alſo provided againſt this caſe:— ' Art. VI. If the king ſhall put himſelf at the head of an army, and direct its ' force againſt the nation; or if he does not oppoſe by a formal act, ſuch an enterpriſe, ' which may be undertaken in his name, he ſhall be conſidered as having abdicated the ' throne!' ....

.... Weigh well, I beſeech you the nature of the crime provided againſt by this article. None more criminal can exiſt. It ſuppoſes all the machinations, all the perfidies, all the ſcourges, all the horrors, and all the calamities of a bloody inteſtine war; .... and yet what does the conſtitution pronounce? A preſumption of the king having abdicated the throne.

' Art. VII. If the king quit the kingdom, and does not return, after being invited ' to do ſo by the legiſlative body.' .... What does the conſtitution declare in this caſe? A preſumption that he has abdicated the throne.

" Art. VIII. States, that after an expreſs or legal abdication, the king ſhall be tried, like other citizens, for all crimes poſterior to his abdication. It reſults, then, that the king had a particular exiſtence, abſolutely different from that of other citizens; and whence aroſe this particular, this privileged exiſtence, but from the law, which conferred upon him that character of inviolability, which he could not loſe, but by an expreſs and legal abdication? Is it after being guilty of the moſt atrocious crime a king can commit againſt the nation, that it ſuppoſes him to have entered the claſs of citizens? In ſhort, the law here is perfectly equal with regard to the legiſlative body and the king. The legiſlative body might alſo betray the nation. It might invade the national ſovereignty. The nation had a right to eſtabliſh a puniſhment for the deputies, and yet this has not been the caſe.

"Louis is accuſed—he is accuſed in the name of the nation—he is accuſed of various crimes: Theſe crimes are either provided againſt by the conſtitutional act, and then the puniſhment there eſtabliſhed is to be applied to them; or they are not provided againſt, and in that caſe there exiſts no puniſhment which can be applied to them.

"I will go farther—I ſay they have been provided for,.... The moſt atrocious of all, that of a criminal war againſt the nation has been provided for. In whatever manner that article may be underſtood, the crimes are there—they are all there; but the law only declares, that preſumption of the throne being abdicated. I am well aware, that as the nation have at preſent aboliſhed royalty, the puniſhment cannot be applied; but could it change the condition of Louis? Has he not a right to ſay, I was the priſoner of the nation, why did you not bring me to trial?—you have aboliſhed royalty. I do not diſpute your right, but what—becauſe you have aboliſhed royalty, do you wiſh to puniſh me? And becauſe you know no law applicable to me, do you wiſh to create one for me—for me alone? You are doubtleſs inveſted with every power, but there is one which you have not---that of being unjuſt.

"It is ſaid that Louis ought to be tried as an enemy. But is he not a very cruel enemy who could put himſelf at the head of an army againſt the nation?--- It has been ſaid, that he was inviolable only in regard to every citizen individually. According to his principle would not the repreſentatives of the people be more inviolable in regard to the people, for whatever they might have done, ſaid, or written during a ſeſſion? I ſhall here quote to you a paſſage from Rouſſeau: "where I ſee neither the law "which proſecutes, nor the law which condemns, I will not refer to the general "will; for the general will cannot pronounce as the general will, either againſt any man, "or any fact."

"But if you take from Louis the right of being inviolable, you cannot take from him the right of being tried as a citizen: and in the latter caſe I would aſk you, where are theſe protecting forms; where are theſe juries, which are as it were hoſtages for the lives and honour of citizens? I would aſk you, where is that proportion of ſuffrages which the law has ſo wiſely eſtabliſhed? Where is that ſilent ballot which incloſes in the ſame urn the conſcience and opinion of the judge? I ſpeak to you with the openneſs of a ſon of freedom. I wiſh to find among you judges, and I ſee only accuſers---you wiſh to paſs ſentence upon Louis, and you have already expreſſed your ſentiments on his caſe! You wiſh to paſs ſetence upon Louis, and your opinions are well known over all Europe!

"I now proceed to the act of accuſation. You go back to the month of July 1789. I ſhall go back to the ſame period; but how could you accuſe Louis of having then attempted to diſſolve the aſſembly? Do you forget that it was he who convoked it? Do you forget that for above a century and a half, princes, more jealous of their authority than he, conſtantly refuſed ſuch a convocation? Do you forget, that had it not been for Louis, and the numberleſs ſacrifices to which he conſented, you would not be here deliberating on the intereſts of the ſtate? ..... He is accuſed of ſurrounding Paris with troops, but I can ſay that theſe troops were deſtined only to protect Paris from thoſe who wiſhed to diſturb the public tranquillity. I had occaſion to ſee the orders given to them, when I undertook the defence of the commandant, whom the nation without any heſitation acquitted.

"I ſhall not here take notice of the paper in which Talon is mentioned as acting a part in a plan formed for a counter-revolution, nor of the papers ſubjoined to that memoire. Had I to defend a perſon of ordinary rank, I would obſerve that a citizen cannot be comdemned from papers procured by attacking his habitation, unleſs they have been previouſly ſealed up, and an inventory taken of them. The habitation of Louis was attacked, and his drawers were broke open. None of them were ſealed up, no inventories were taken, and papers which might have been oppoſed to others may have been concealed. The letters of a deceaſed perſon are quoted, but can the letters of a perſon deceaſed be adduced as proofs? Theſe letters it is ſaid, mention money diſtributed; but even ſuppoſing that this fact, which they do not clear up, were true; and ſuppoſing it true, that greater or ſmaller ſums had been extorted from the beneficence and ſenſibility of Louis, do you not know with what unhappy facility king's may be ſurprized and deceived? The plan of a letter to Lafayette and Mirabeau is mentioned; but this letter was never ſent. Mirabeau and Lafayette were at that time the two moſt popular characters; they both loved the conſtitution, and nothing was meant in that letter but the good of the ſtate. Louis, is accuſed alſo of having written a letter to Bouille; in regard to this, he has no occaſion to juſtify himſelf; the national aſſembly had before voted thanks to Bouille for his good conduct.....

"You accuſe him for the aſſemblage on the twenty-eighth of February; but popular rumours had attracted at that time a number of violent perſons round the palace, and Louis ordered them to lay aſide their arms. You accuſe him of the maſſacre, in the Champ-de-Mars, but do you forget that this unhappy prince was then ſuſpended from his powers, and was watched like a priſoner!..... The nation has decreed that it ſhall be a republic, but this was not the form of government it wiſhed for then. Did not the legiſlative aſſembly declare againſt a republic in the month of July laſt? Had Louis betrayed the intereſts of the nation at that period, or had he abuſed its confidence, you ought to have pitied him—you ought to have bewailed the fate of kings---but he ought not to have been tried;..... I have not yet pronounced the word which would have made that chain of accuſations fall—I have not ſaid, that, ſince all theſe facts, Louis accepted the conſtitution---the conſtitution was the contract of alliance between the people and the king---there was no longer any doubt---the paſt was forgotten. Let us now examine what Louis has done ſince his acceptation. The act of accuſation comprehends facts for which Louis was not bound to anſwer perſonally, and facts for which he was perſonally reſponſible. By the conſtitution, the king was not reſponſible for what might be done by his agents. On the contrary, it made his miniſters reſponſible. At preſent, one has no right to accuſe the king and his miniſters for the ſame acts.

" Louis is accuſed of having left the national aſſembly ignorant of the convention of Pilnitz. But this convention was a ſecret treaty between the emperor and the king of Pruſſia. There was no reaſon of ſtate that could make it a rule for miniſters to communicate to an aſſembly whoſe deliberations were public, an act which was not public. You have accuſed Louis of having retarded, for a month, the tranſmiſſion of the decree relative to Avignon. That, Citizens, was one of the charges againſt the miniſter Deleſſart, who had declared, that his defence, which he was preparing in his priſon, would leave no doubt of his innocence. And can you, after his death, prefer the ſame charge againſt the king? You have charged him with the troubles of Niſmes and of Jales. Was the king reſponſible for all the troubles inſeparable from ſo great a revolution?

" A letter of Witgenſtein is imputed to him as a crime: All that he could do, was to give Witgenſtein no appointment after his recal. The ſituation of commandant of Corſica is talked of, but that command he never obtained. It is ſaid, that he had an appointment in the army of the north. Lafayette may have aſked it, but the letter that gave him ſuch an appointment, remained in the war-office.

" Louis is accuſed of the account given by Narbonne. I ſhall anſwer but a word. When Narbonne quitted the miniſtry, the legiſlative aſſembly decreed, that he carried with him the regret and the confidence of the nation. The ſurrender of Longwy is made a charge againſt him, but the inhabitants alone were guilty—The ſurrender of Verdun is made a charge againſt him—who then but Louis appointed the commandant, ſo celebrated for his heroiſm, who preferred death to ſurrendering?

" He is accuſed of having retained the Swiſs guards, although the conſtitution forbad it. Mark the facts. A decree ſaid that the king ſhould be requeſted to preſent a new formation of his regiment of Swiſs guards, in the mean time the aſſembly had directed, that it ſhould be kept up proviſionally till the period of this formation. On the third of July, the aſſembly ordered the departure of the three battalions of this regiment. On the ſeventeenth was written the letter of D'Affry, remonſtrating againſt the decree, and appealing to the capitulations—a new decree was paſſed which ordered the departure of two battalions—D'Affry heſitating between the decree and the capitulations, addreſſed new remonſtrances to the aſſembly. The aſſembly paſſed to the order of the day; and the battalions left Paris.

" I come now to the facts which may be conſidered as concerning him perſonally. Louis is firſt attacked for not having ſanctioned the decree reſpecting the prieſts, and that reſpecting the camp at Paris. I might ſay, that the conſtitution gave him the free and abſolute power of ſanction; and that, if he erred, his error could not be imputed to him as a crime. But if a great number of citizens ſeemed to ſupport the latter decree, a ſtill greater number ſeemed to oppoſe it. He thought it prudent to refuſe his ſanction but, at the ſame time, by a wiſe meaſure, he directed the formation of a camp at Soiſſons; and this camp was more uſeful to our armies than that at Paris could have been.

" His letter to the biſhop of Clermont is objected to him: But that letter contains only an opinion purely religious, and was prior to his acceptance of the conſtitution. When he accepted the conſtitution, he did not think it free from blemiſhes; for, in the very act of accepting it, he ſpeaks of legal reforms. He is accuſed of having paid his guard; but the aſſembly, in decreeing its diſcharge, had ſaid that it ſhould be organiſed anew. It was therefore incumbent on his juſtice and his humanity to pay it till its new formation. He is accuſed of having given aid to the emigrants, and of having protected, by his ambaſſadors, the coalition of foreign powers. He is accuſed of his influence at the court of Vienna. I anſwer, that Louis conſtantly oppoſed the efforts of the emigrants. Reſpecting this, I will cite a fact. Louis was informed, by his reſident, of an attempt of the emigrants to obtain arms and ammunition at Frankfort, and of the refuſal of the magiſtrates of Frankfort. He directed the reſident to thank the magiſtrates, and to invite them to perſevere in their refuſal.

"There is not a ſingle emigrant that received aid from him. He provided for the maintenance of his nephews; the eldeſt was fourteen, the youngeſt eleven years of age; there was no law that fixed the age at which emigration was a crime: ..... The convention has made one. The nephews of Lewis were without reſources. Muſt he ſtifle the ſentiments of humanity? Muſt he, for being a king, ceaſe to be a kinſman? He gave money to the governeſs of the children, but ſhe was the governeſs of his children, and had left France ſince 1789. Choiſſeul-Beaupré had been in Italy ſince 1789, and had never borne arms againſt France. He gave aid to Rochefort, but Rochefort was not an emigrant. He is accuſed of having remitted money to Bouille; Bouille's letter ſays, 'Pay to 'Monſieur, the king's brother, by his order.' The truth is, that he never remitted pecuniary aid to Monſieur, and the order in queſtion was the order of Monſieur, and not of the king. All that he did was to give ſecurity for his other brother for a ſum of forty thouſand livres; but this was in 1789, and he was induced to it by motives of humanity.

"He is accuſed of the manœuvres of Dumouſtier at the court of Berlin; but Dumouſtier was not the agent of Louis, but of the princes, his brothers.

"A letter of Choiſſeul-Gouffier is objected to him. It is ſuppoſed that becauſe he was the ambaſſador of Louis, to Louis muſt his projects be imputed; but the very letter of this ambaſſador proves that it was three days after his recal, and on account of that recal that he formed an intrigue againſt the national ambaſſador ſent to replace him. It was Choiſſeul who wrote, who acted, who ſpoke of his ſervices to the princes the king's brothers, The billet proves that Louis had no connection with him.

"I come now to the charges of the ſubornation of ſeveral members of the legiſlative aſſembly! ..... This plan reduced the liquidation of offices, ten millions; he eaſed the national treaſury to that amount, and charged the civil liſt with the intereſt. We underſtand the corruption that turns to the profit of perſonal intereſt; but a corruption that leaves us all the ſhame, and gives to another all the profit, we cannot eaſily comprehend. The fact is, as it appears from the papers communicated to Louis, that it was he alone who prevented the decree from being propoſed to the aſſembly, and that he expreſſed diſpleaſure and indignation at it.

"A charge is brought againſt him which has excited the indignation of the people, and which could not but appear a very heavy one. He is accuſed of having paid his body-guards at Coblentz; ..... This charge I own ſtruck me with grief; I was led to ſuſpect the good faith of Louis; the proofs appeared to be clear. I come this day to make the reparation in the eyes of Europe, which I feel that I owe to him. All the papers refer to the month of October 1791. Mark what the adminiſtrators of the civil liſt wrote to the treaſurer in November: 'The intention of his majeſty is to continue 'the pay of his body-guards, till they be replaced; but his majeſty means that the amount of this pay ſhall not be delivered in total to the etat-major, but to each individual at the pay-office of the civil liſt, on his particular receipt of reſidence within the kingdom.' All the papers have been made as public as poſſible—Louis has been denounced to France, and to all Europe. All the articles of accuſation have been ordered to be printed; and the only paper that refutes theſe charges, is the only one that has remained unknown This paper muſt have been among the reſt. By what ſtrange fatality is it not to be found among them? At laſt Louis, after much pains, obtained from the offices, an authentic copy of this paper. He has produced it to the eyes of Europe.

"I come at laſt to the diſaſtrous day of the tenth of Auguſt. Had we believed that Louis had committed the crimes of which he is accuſed you would not ſee us at this bar to give him the aid of our courageous veracity. All your ſucceſſes ſince that day have given you the power of being generous—we aſk you only to be juſt:.... He dreaded the invaſion of his palace: he maintained a more exact correſpondence with the popular authorities—In fine, the people came thither. The procurator ſyndic reads, with regret no doubt, the fifth article of the law, which directs to repel force by force.... The cannoneers for anſwer diſcharge their cannon before him.... Then the procurator ſyndic invites Louis to go to the aſſembly; he goes thither. One hour after, our misfortunes commence;... How began the action? I know not. Hiſtory will perhaps know more than I do. He is accuſed of having reviewed the troops—granted. Accuſe the mayor alſo of having viſited the poſts. Was not Louis a conſtituted authority? Was not his authority a depoſit in his hands, of which the law forbad him the leaſt infringement? I know it has been ſaid that Louis excited the inſurrection, to effect the execution of his projects; but, who is now ignorant that this inſurrection was combined, matured; that it had its agents, its counſel, its directors; who is ignorant that acts—that treaties on the ſubject had been ſigned?

"In this hall men have contended for the glory of the tenth of Auguſt.... I come not to diſpute that glory; but ſince it has been proved that, that day was premeditated, how can it be made a crime in Louis? And you accuſe him—and you would give judgement againſt him.... againſt him.... who has never given a ſanguinary order;—againſt him, who at Varennes preferred returning a captive, to expoſing the life of a ſingle man;—againſt him, who on the twentieth of June refuſed every kind of aid, and preferred remaining alone in the midſt of the people! Hear hiſtory ſpeak——Louis mounted the throne at the age of twenty; he exhibited on it an example of morals, of juſtice, of economy; he aboliſhed ſervitude in his domains; the people deſired liberty, he gave it. [Murmurs.] We cannot deny to Louis the glory of having always anticipated the wiſhes of the people—I do not conclude; I appeal to hiſtory; think that hiſtory will judge your judgement."

The counſel reſpectfully bowed his head and ſat down—the preſident Fermond, then roſe and ſaid—"Louis, have you any thing further to add to the defence made by your "counſel."

Louis then roſe with ſome emotion, but collecting himſelf, he ſaid—"Citizens, my "means of defence are before you, I need not repeat them. In ſpeaking to you perhaps "for the laſt time, I declare to you, that my conſcience makes me no reproach, and "that my defenders have told you nothing but the truth. I have never dreaded the "public examination of my conduct; but my heart is rent to find in the accuſation,

" the imputation of having wiſhed to ſhed the blood of the people; and, above all, " that the misfortunes of the tenth of Auguſt are attributed to me. I own, that the " many proofs I have given upon all occaſions of my love for the people, and the man- " ner in which I have always conducted myſelf, appeared to me ſufficient to prove, " that I did not fear to expoſe my own perſon, to ſpare their blood; and to exempt " me for ever from ſuch an imputation.."

The keys found at the garde-meuble were then preſented to him, and he was aſked if he knew them—"I know," ſaid he, "that I delivered keys to Thierry; but I know " that my houſe was forced, and all my furniture broken. I had no more occaſion " for keys; but I know not whether thoſe preſented to me are the ſame that I delivered. " From the time that has elapſed I cannot recollect them."

He then retired, and on going out a ſudden flush overſpread his countenance, and a few tears fell.

A decree was immediately paſſed, that he ſhould be reconducted to the Temple; that the defence made by the counſel ſhould be ſigned by him and them; that the words—" the people deſired liberty, and he gave it"—which had excited murmurs, and had been ſince ſtruck out by the counſel, ſhould be replaced; that the defence ſhould be printed under the inſpection of the counſel, and circulated through the eighty-four departments.

The diſcuſſions on the defence of Louis and ſeparate propoſitions of ſeveral members continued many days; there appeared a general concurrence in the opinion of his guilt: the form of proceeding, and the degree and mode of puniſhment, principally occupied theſe ſittings. The variety of opinion on theſe points was very ſtriking, from the circumſtance that members generally underſtood to belong to the moſt oppoſite parties concurred in the ſame opinion, and thoſe who were uſually conſidered as the moſt decidedly attached to each other by the ties of party, diſagreed in the important points concerning the puniſhment and the period and manner of its execution.

Among theſe opinions ſome were for an immediate vote upon the general charge and execution without delay, as Marat, Robeſpierre, Chabot, Robert, Fabre, Legendre, St. Juſt, Duhem, Morriſon, Dubois-Crance, St. André, Bentabole, and Danton; others were of opinion that he ought to ſuffer death, but deemed it prudent and neceſſary to diſcuſs the expediency of retarding or accelerating the puniſhment, as Mailhe, Treilhard, Gaudet, Genſonne, Vergniaud and Briſſot; a third were agreed in his abſolute guilt to the full extent that had been charged, but convinced it would be a more ſuitable puniſhment, to confine him during the war and then to baniſh him, of this opinion, were Petion, Manuel, Salles, Buſſault, Rabaut, Cambaceres, Guellimard, Louvet, Charles, Villette, and Thomas Paine; the opinion of the latter is important in itſelf, connected with the man and the hiſtory, we ſhall give it at length, as it was delivered in writing to the convention, upon the diſcuſſion of death. There were alſo a few who were courageous enough to vote for the acquittal; and a very critical diſcuſſion was introduced, upon the queſtion whether the ſentence paſſed ſhould not be finally referred to the deciſion of the people in primary aſſemblies.

The baleful ſpirit of faction however was not aſleep during theſe ſolemn diſcuſſions; Gaſparin introduced a charge againſt Vergniaud, Genſonne, and Gaudet, who he alleged had preſented to Louis through the means of Thierry his valet, a memorial ſigned by them; he had his information from Boze a painter who was concerned in the tranſaction; which he believed amounted to a conſpiracy; and Robeſpierre denounced Roland, who he alleged had concealed that paper, and others.

Thuriot a member of the mountain, defended Roland, and Gaudet in a very manly ſpeech refuted the calumny, which neverthelefs, had a conſiderable influence on the public mind, though a ſubſequent examination of Boze alſo acquitted them.

The fourteenth however was appointed for the final conſideration of the evidence and deciſion on the reſult; after a debate which continued till ten at night, it was decreed that the names of the members ſhould be called over in the alphabetical order of their departments, and that they ſhould anſwer yes or no, on the three following propoſitions:

I. Is Louis guilty of a conſpiracy againſt the liberty of the nation, and of attempts againſt the ſafety of the ſtate.?

II. Shall recourſe he had to the appeal to the people before inflicting puniſhment.?

III. What puniſhment ſhall he ſuffer?

On the fifteenth, it was decreed that in voting on the ſeveral queſtions, the anſwer of each member ſhould be entered after his name, and the liſt afterwards ſent to the eighty-four departments.

Upon the firſt queſtion, one of the ſecretaries called over the names, and it appeared that of ſeven hundred and forty-five votes, twenty-ſix were abſent on leave, five through illneſs, one without any cauſe aſſigned, twenty-ſix had made various declarations on the queſtion, and ſix hundred and ninety-three had voted in the affirmative.

Whereupon Verginaud the preſident roſe and ſaid—"I declare in the name of the "convention, that Louis Capet is guilty of conſpiring againſt the liberty of the "nation, and of attempts againſt the general ſafety of the ſtate."

The ſecond queſtion was then put in the ſame form; a great number of members aſſigned motives for voting againſt any appeal, but the moſt forcible was, that it would be the means of producing a civil war; upon calling over the names there appeared to be twenty members abſent with leave, ten who would not vote, three ſick, three abſent without any cauſe aſſigned, in the affirmative two hundred and eighty-three, and in the negative four hundred and twenty-four.

The preſident then roſe and declared—"The national convention decrees, that the "judgment which it ſhall pronounce upon Louis Capet, ſhall not be ſubjected to an ap"peal to the people."

While this important tranſaction was before the convention, the eyes of all Europe were turned with mixed emotions towards France; the court of Spain, ſo intimately connected with the monarch, and by the proximity of ſituation and collateral intereſts between the two nations, had not been indifferent to that iſſue, which from the firſt had been ſo clearly foreſeen. On the twenty-ſixth of December the Spaniſh miniſter d'Ocariz preſented a letter to Le Brun, oſtenſibly on the ſubject of neutrality, but in fact intended to operate in favour of Louis. Some warlike preparations on the part of Spain had induced a demand on the part of the French through their agent at Madrid, of the intention of thoſe meaſures; this letter ſtated that the anſwer was ſent by a French courier, the more ſtrongly to manifeſt that no ſecret deſigns were entertained towards France; that Spaniſh troops uſually ſtationed on the French frontier would be withdrawn thence, had it not been neceſſary to retain them there to prevent evil diſpoſed perſons from introducing seditious maxims into Spain; that no doubt could be entertained of the sincerity of Spain, and that "nothing could so much contribute to consolidate the union of "the two nations, and in which all Europe had likewise an interest, as the issue "of the momentous subject that then occupied France. It is by the manner in which "France shall treat the unfortunate king Lewis XVI. and his family that foreign nations "will be able to judge with certainty of her generosity and her moderation."

After entering into a consideration of the case, and venting some severe recriminations on the king's persecutors, little calculated to produce a moderate determination in any case, he suggests "Even the presence of Louis XVI. and his family in the "country which they should choose for an asylum, would be an existing testimony of "the generosity and power of the French, and would teach all men that your nation "knows how to unite moderation with victory; that she has noble and beneficent "passions only, and that the triumphs of her arms do not hinder her from voluntarily "bowing her head before the image of justice."

This letter appears to have been dictated under impressions of the power of Spain being very formidable to France, and that the nation was likely to be acted upon by the apprehensions of a general union of the powers of Europe. But the conduct of the convention and the events that have followed, too clearly expose the weakness of such impressions. This letter was followed by another from the same minister on the seventeenth of January, containing a proposition of mediation on the part of Spain, with a view to peace between France and the powers at war, implying that because the measure would be useful to France it should also operate to soften the destiny of the king's unhappy relative. The first of these letters had been referred to the diplomatic committee, the other was not suffered to be read.

Several efforts were also made by individuals in the monarch's behalf; Cazales, who had distinguished himself in the constituent assembly, and taken flight to England, solicited a passport in order to appear as the defender of Louis; the same offer was made by Narbonne the former minister of war, and Lally-Tollendal; Bouillé had the imprudence after his public perjury and treachery, to transmit an attestation in the king's favour, concerning the flight to Montmedy; and Choiseul, who had been active in stirring up all the potentates of Europe against France, expected that a declaration from him concerning the money that had been in Bouille's hands, would operate in his favour. But among the blind and unfortunate acts of his friends, that of Bertrand, the former minister of marine, was the most striking; he transmitted from England a number of papers calculated not to prove the king's innocence, but that both the parties in the convention, the mountain and the Gironde, had been in secret negociation with the king for the restoration of his power. Under what fatality of mind such a communication should have been made is unaccountable, considering that Bertrand could not be ignorant that the persons to whom it was offered were the very persons whom it accused. If it was intended to sow jealousy between the parties, and to loosen the national confidence in them, the former perhaps was effected, but as the papers were not published, the latter intention was so far abortive. But it proved only more fatal to the unhappy monarch, as it went to establish his having received overtures, contrary to his oath.

On the sixteenth the question of punishment was to be determined; but much of the day was employed in debating upon the amount of the majority necessary to decide upon this question; it was urged that the majority should be two-thirds of the votes; to this it was anſwered that the queſtion ought to be deceided by the ſame principle that every queſtion concerning the people is determined, the abſolute majority, which was ſufficient for declaring war, that is condemning to death thouſands of men. It was therefore decreed that the majority ſhould be one. It was ſeven at night before the votes were began to be taken.

On the ſeventeenth the voting continued without intermiſſion. It was during this ſitting that the ſecond letter of the Spaniſh ambaſſador was received, and paſſed over for the order of the day. The counſel of Louis alſo notified their attendance, and it was ordered that they ſhould be admitted after the votes ſhould be completed. A member then obſerved that ſeveral votes had been given for death with certain reſtrictions; it would be neceſſary to decide upon them, firſt that they ſhould be conſidered as formal votes for death, and ſecondly referring to freſh votes and further diſcuſſion the deciſion of the period at which it ſhould be executed. This was adopted.

The votes having been all taken, the preſident notified that he was about to proclaim the reſult . . . . A moſt profound ſilence prevailed for ſeveral minutes—He then ſaid——

" The aſſembly conſiſts of ſeven hundred and forty-five members—of whom one has " died, ſix are ſick, two abſent without cauſe and cenſured in the minutes accordingly, " eleven abſent upon public duties, and four who do not vote, making in all twenty- " three repreſentatives who have given no opinion. The number of votes is thus " reduced to ſeven hundred and twenty-one. In order that there may be a majority, " it is neceſſary that there ſhould be an union of three hundred and ſixty three ſuffrages. " Twenty-one have voted for death, demanding a diſcuſſion of the period; one for " death with a reſerve of its commutation or delay; two for death, but not to be execu- " ted until after peace ſhall have been concluded, unleſs in caſe of an invaſion of the " French territory, in which caſe to take place twenty four hours after the invaſion; " two for chains; three hundred and nineteen for impriſonment and baniſhment; three " hundred and ſixty-ſix for death."

The preſident then lowering his voice amidſt the moſt profound and awful ſilence ſaid—" I declare in the name of the convention, that the puniſhment which it pro- " nounces againſt Louis Capet is—Death."

The three counſel of the king were then admitted; Deſeze addreſſed the convention:—

" Citizens repreſentatives, the law of the nation and humanity have entruſted to us the ſacred function of the defence of Louis. We come, with regret, to preſent to you the laſt act of our function. Louis has given to us his expreſs charge, to read to you a letter ſigned with his own hand, of which the following is a copy:

" I owe it to my own honor, I owe it to my family, not to ſubſcribe to a ſentence which declares me guilty of a crime of which I cannot accuſe myſelf. In conſequence I appeal to the nation from the ſentence of its repreſentatives; and I commit by theſe preſents to the fidelity of my defenders, to make known to the national convention this appeal, by all the means in their power, and to demand, that mention of it b made in the minutes of their ſitting. (Signed) Louis."

Deſeze then reſumed his ſpeech; he ſolemnly invoked the convention in the name of his colleagues to conſider by what a ſmall majority the ſentence was paſſed; " Do not " afflict France," ſaid he, " by a judgement that will appear terrible to her, when fu-

"voices only were sufficient to carry it." He conjured them to consider how large the number was that would not accord with that vote, and how respectable their opinions supported by benevolence and the peace of the country.

Tronchet, another of the defenders of Louis, protested against the decree, by which the assembly had declared that the sentence should be passed, like its other decrees, by an absolute majority. He demanded the repeal of the decree, observing, that as the penal code had served as the basis of the opinion of those who had pronounced the punishment of death, the assembly ought, conformably to that code, not to pronounce punishment except by two-thirds of the voices.

Lamoignon Malesherbes, the third counsel of Louis, begged the convention to allow him till the next day to present some observations on the kind of majority, which to him seemed necessary, before sentence should be pronounced.

The president informed the counsel that their requests would be considered, and invited them to the honours of the sitting. A member while they were present refuted the objection of Tronchet; the penal code, he said, required a majority of two-thirds, not for the application of punishment, but for the declaration of facts; that the distinction was in itself clear, two-thirds being required to decide upon evidence before trial, to examine whether it was of a nature cognizable by justice or the contrary; the decision upon the trial by that evidence, opposed by every species of counter-evidence and argument was a different case, it was a decision between innocence and guilt, where every means of defence is open, and the absolute majority only can be proper. It was thereupon decreed, that there were no grounds for further discussion or appeals on the subject of the majority.

On the eighteenth a member stated, that some very singular errors were committed in proclaiming the result of the votes on the preceding day; that the whole representation was stated at seven hundred and forty-five, which was only the number prior to the incorporation of Avignon, but since that period three representatives had been added; the votes as they were proclaimed were remarkably incorrect in other respects, several having been returned by the secretaries as voting for imprisonment who voted for death. This occasioned a tumultuous debate, in which Manuel, Sallos, and Lesage, who were secretaries, stood implicated; and it was in consequence decreed that there should be a scrutiny.

On the nineteenth the examination was accomplished, and the president announced, that the actual majority consisted of twenty-seven votes. It was on the question of death on this day that Thomas Paine delivered at the tribune the following opinion;—

"Citizen President,

"My hatred and abhorrence of monarchy are sufficiently known; they originate in principles of reason and conviction, nor except with life can they be extirpated; but my compassion for the unfortunate, whether friend or enemy, is equally lively and sincere.

"I voted that Louis should be tried, because it was necessary to afford proofs to the world of the perfidy, corruption, and abomination of the monarchical system. The infinity of evidence that has been produced, exposes them in the most glaring and hideous colours. Thence it results, that monarchy, whatever form it may assume, arbitrary or otherwise, becomes necessarily a centre, round which are united every species of corruption, and that the kingly trade is no less destructive of all humanity in the human breast, than the trade of an executioner is destructive of its sensibility.

"I remember, during my reſidence in another country, that I was exceedingly ſtruck with a ſentence of M. Autheine, at the Jacobins, which correſponds exactly with my own idea, 'Make me a king to-day,' ſaid he, 'and I ſhall be a robber to-morrow.'

"Neverthelefs, I am inclined to believe, that if Louis Capet had been born in an obſcure condition, had he lived within the circle of an amiable and reſpectable neighbourhood, at liberty to practiſe the duties of domeſtic life, had he been thus ſituated, I cannot believe that he would have ſhewn himſelf deſtitute of ſocial virtues; we are in a moment of fermentation like this, naturally little indulgent to his vices, or rather to thoſe of monarchical governments, we regard them with additional horror and indignation; not that they are more heinous than thoſe of his predeceſſors, but becauſe our eyes are now open, and the veil of deluſion at length withdrawn; yet the lamentable, degraded ſtate to which he is actually reduced, is ſurely far leſs imputable to him, than to the conſtituent aſſembly, which, of its own authority, without conſent or advice of the people, reſtored him to the throne.

"I was in Paris at the time of the flight, or abdication of Louis the Sixteenth, and when he was taken and brought back. The propoſal of reſtoring him to the ſupreme power ſtruck me with amazement; and although at that time, I was not a French citizen, yet as a citizen of the world, I employed all the efforts that depended on me to prevent it.

"A ſmall ſociety, compoſed only of five perſons,* two of whom are now members of the convention, took, at that time, the name of a Republican Club, (Societé Republicaine.) This ſociety oppoſed the reſtoration of Louis, not ſo much on acount of his own perſonal offences, as in order to overthrow the monarchy, and to erect on its ruins the Republican Syſtem, and an equal repreſentation.

"With this deſign, I traced out in the Engliſh language certain propoſitions, which were tranſlated, with ſome trifling alterations, and ſigned by Achilles Duchatelet, actually lieutenant-general in the army of the French Republic, and that time one of the five members which compoſed our little party; the law requiring the ſignature of a citizen at bottom of each printed paper.

"The paper was indignantly torn by Malouet, and brought forth as an article of accuſation againſt the perſon who had ſigned it, the author, and their adherents; but ſuch is the revolution of events, that this paper is now revived, and brought forth for a very oppoſite purpoſe;—to remind the nation of the error of that unfortunate day, that fatal error of not then having baniſhed Louis the Sixteenth from its boſom, and to plead this day in favour of his exile, preferable to his death.

"The paper in queſtion was conceived in the following terms:

'Brethren and Fellow-Citizens,

'The ſerene tranquillity, the mutual confidence which prevailed amongſt us during the time of the late king's eſcape, the indifference with which we beheld him return, are unequivocal proofs that the abſence of a king is more deſirable than his preſence, and that he is not only a political ſuperfluity, but a grevious burthen preſſing hard on the whole nation.

'Let us not be impoſed on by ſophiſms; all that concerns this man, is reduced to four points.

* Condorcet, Briſſot, Duchatelet, Giry Dupre, and Thomas Paine.

'He has abdicated the throne in having fled from his poſt. Abdication and deſertion are not characteriſed by the length of abſence; but the ſingle act of flight. In the preſent inſtance, the act is every thing, and the time nothing.

'The nation can never give back its confidence to a man who, falſe to his truſt, perjured to his oath, conſpires a clandeſtine flight, obtains a fradulent paſſport, conceals a king of France under the diſguiſe of a valet, directs his courſe towards a frontier covered with traitors and deſerters, and evidently meditates a return into our country, with a force capable of impoſing his own deſpotic laws.

'Whether ought this flight to be conſidered as his own act, or the act of thoſe who fled with him. Was it a ſpontaneous reſolution of his own, or was it inſpired into him by others; The alternative is immaterial: whether fool or hypocrite, idiot or traitor, he has proved himſelf equally unworthy of the vaſt important functions that had been delegated to him.

'In every ſenſe that the queſtion can be conſidered, the reciprocal obligation which ſubſiſted between us is diſſolved. He holds no longer authority: we owe him no longer obedience; we ſee in him now no more than an indifferent perſon; we can regard him only as Louis Capet.

'The hiſtory of France preſents little elſe than a long ſeries of public calamity, which takes its ſource from the vices of her kings; we have been the wretched victims that have never ceaſed to ſuffer either for them or by them. The catalogue of their oppreſſions was complete; but to complete the ſum of their crimes, treaſon yet was wanting; now, the only vacancy is filled up, the dreadful liſt is full; the ſyſtem is exhauſted; there are no remaining errors for them to commit, their reign is conſequently at an end.

'What kind of office muſt that be in a government which it requires neither experience nor ability to execute? that may be abandoned to the deſparate chance of birth, that may be filled by an idiot, a tyrant, a madman, with equal effect, as by the good, the virtuous, and the wiſe! An office of this nature is a mere nonentity; it is a place of ſhew, not of uſe. Let France then, arrived at the age of reaſon, no longer be deluded by the ſound of words, and let her deliberately examine, if a king, however inſignificant and contemptible in himſelf, may not at the ſame time be extremely dangerous.

'The thirty millions which it coſts to ſupport a king in the eclat of ſtupid brutal luxury, preſents us with an eaſy method of reducing taxes, which reduction would at once releaſe the people, and ſtop the progreſs of political corruption. The grandeur of nations conſiſts not, as kings pretend in the ſplendor of thrones, but in a conſcious ſenſe of their own dignity, and in a juſt diſdain of thoſe barbarous follies, and crimes, which under the ſanction of royalty, have hitherto deſolated Europe.

'As to the perſonal ſafety of Mr. Louis Capet, it is ſo much the more confirmed, as France will not ſtop to degrade herſelf by a ſpirit of revenge againſt a wretch, who has diſhonoured himſelf. In defending a juſt and glorious cauſe, it is not poſſible to degrade it, and the univerſal tranquillity which prevails, is an undeniable proof that a free people know how to reſpect themſelves.'

"Having thus explained the principles and exertions of the republicans at that fatal period when Louis was reinſtated in full poſſeſſion of the executive power; which by his flight had been ſuſpended, I return to the ſubject, and to the deplorable condition in which the man is now actually involved.

"What was neglected at the time of which I have been ſpeaking, has been ſince brought about by the force of neceſſity; the wilful treacherous defects in the former conſtitution have been brought to light, the continual alarm of treaſon and conſpiracy rouſed the nation and produced eventually a ſecond revolution. The people have beat down royalty, never, never to riſe again; they have brought Louis Capet to the bar, and demonſtrated in the face of the whole world, the intrigues, the cabals, the falſehood, corruption, and rooted depravity, the inevitable effects of monarchical governments. There remains then only one queſtion to be conſidered, what is to be done with this man?

"For myſelf, I freely confeſs, that when I reflect on the unaccountable folly, that reſtored the executive power to his hands, all covered as he was with perjuries and treaſon, I am far more ready to condemn the conſtituent aſſembly than the unfortunate priſoner Louis Capet.

"But abſtracted from every other conſideration, there is one circumſtance in his life which ought to cover, or at leaſt palliate a great number of his tranſgreſſions, and this very circumſtance affords the French nation a bleſſed occaſion of extricating itſelf from the yoke of kings, without defiling itſelf in the impurities of their blood.

"It is to France alone, I know, that the United States of America owe that ſupport which enabled them to ſhake off the unjuſt and tyrannical yoke of England. The ardor which ſhe diſplayed to provide both men and money, were the natural conſequences of a thirſt for liberty. But as the nation at that time, reſtrained by the ſhackles of her own government, could only act by means of a monarchical organ, this organ, whatever in other reſpects the object might be, certainly performed a good, a great action. Let, therefore, theſe United States be the ſafeguard and aſylum of Louis Capet. There, hereafter, far removed from the miſeries and crimes of royalty, he may learn, from the conſtant aſpect of public proſperity, that the true ſyſtem of government conſiſts, not in kings, but in fair, equal, and honorable repreſentation.

"In relating this circumſtance, and in ſubmitting this propoſition, I conſider myſelf as a citizen of both countries. I ſubmit it as a citizen of America, who feels the debt of gratitude which he owes to every Frenchman. I ſubmit it alſo as a man, who, altho' the enemy of kings, cannot forget that they are ſubject to human frailties. I ſupport my propoſition as a citizen of the French Republic, becauſe it appears to me to be the beſt, the moſt politic meaſure that can be adopted.

"As far as my experience in public life extends, I have ever obſerved that the great maſs of the people are inviolably juſt, both in their intentions and in their objects; but the true method of accompliſhing that effect, does not always ſhew itſelf in the firſt inſtance.

"For example, the Engliſh nation had groaned under the deſpotiſm of the Stuarts. Hence Charles the firſt loſt his life; yet Charles the ſecond was reſtored to all the plenitude of power, which his father had loſt.

"Forty years had not expired when the ſame family ſtrove to reſtore their ancient oppreſſions; ſo the nation then baniſhed from its territories the whole race. The remedy was effectual. The Stuart family ſunk into obſcurity, confounded itſelf with the multitude, and is at length extinct.

"The French nation more enlightened than England was at that time, has carried her meaſures to a greater length. France is not ſatisfied with expoſing the guilt of the monarch, ſhe has penetrated into the horrors and vices of the monarchy. She has ſhewn them clear as day-light, and for ever cruſhed that infernal ſyſtem; and he, whoever he may be, that ſhould ever dare to reclaim thoſe rights, he would be regarded not as a pretender, but puniſhed as a traitor.

"Two brothers of Louis Capet have baniſhed themſelves from the country; but they are obliged to comply with the ſpirit and etiquette of the courts where they reſide. They can advance no pretenſions on their own account, ſo long as Louis ſhall live.

"The hiſtory of monarchy in France was a ſyſtem pregnant with crimes and murders, cancelling all natural ties, even thoſe by which brothers are united. We know how often they have aſſaſſinated each other to pave a way for power. As thoſe hopes, which the emigrants had repoſed in Louis the XVI. are fled; the laſt which remains reſts upon his death, and their ſituation inclines them to deſire this cataſtrophe, that they may once again rally round a more active chief, and try one further effort under the ci-devant monſieur and d'Artois.

"That ſuch an enterpriſe would precipitate them into a new abyſs of calamity and diſgrace, it is not difficult to foreſee; but yet it might be attended with mutual loſs, and it is our duty as legiſlators not to ſpill a drop of blood, when our purpoſe may be effectually accompliſhed without it.

"It has been already propoſed to aboliſh the puniſhment of death; and it is with infinite ſatisfaction that I recollect the humane and excellent oration pronounced by Robeſpierre on the ſubject in the conſtituent aſſembly. This cauſe muſt find its advocates in every corner, where enlightened politicians and lovers of humanity exiſt; and it ought, above all, to find them in this aſſembly.

"Monarchical governments have trained the human race, and inured it to the arts and refinements of puniſhment; and it is exactly the ſame puniſhment which has ſo long ſhocked the ſight, and tormented the patience of the people, that now, in their turn, they practiſe in revenge on their oppreſſors. But it becomes us to be ſtrictly on our guard againſt the abomination and perverſity of monarchical examples: As France has been the firſt European nation to aboliſh royalty, let her alſo be the firſt to aboliſh the puniſhment of death, and to find out a milder and more effectual ſubſtitute.

"In the particular caſe now under conſideration, I ſubmit the following propoſitions:—1ſt. That the national convention ſhall pronounce ſentence of baniſhment on Louis and his family. 2d. That Louis Capet ſhall be kept in priſon till the end of the war; and at that epoch the ſentence of baniſhment ſhall be carried into execution."

A queſtion aroſe then on the period of execution, and the votes were taken to decide upon the propoſed delay, the members being only to deliver their opinions by yes or no, when the preſident declared, that of ſeven hundred and forty-eight members, ſeventeen were on public miſſions, twenty-one ſick, eight abſent without leave, twelve who did not vote, three hundred and ten were for delay, three hundred and eighty againſt it.

Whereupon Cambaceres roſe and ſaid, "Citizens, by pronouncing the ſentence of death againſt the laſt king of the French, you have done an act which will not paſs away like the meteors of falſe glory—inflexible in juſtice, and more indulgent to tyranny than its crimes and intrigues, its falſhood and hypocriſy are entitled to, unmoved by the ſtorms that burſt abroad and the muttering vengeance that prowls at home, the ſpirit of regenerated France has inſpired you to eſtabliſh your own liberty by a deciſion that will be recorded by the graver of immortality in the annals of hiſtory. Public ſafety proſcribed to you that awful decree. It is paſſed in the name of juſtice; in the name of humanity I ſtand up, to call your attention to the perſon who is the object of it. Let us afford him every poſſible conſolation; and let us take proper meaſures to prevent the execution of the national will from being ſullied by any irregularity. I move therefore, that—

"1. The executive council ſhall be immediately ſummoned, and a copy of the decree which pronounces ſentence of death on Louis ſhall be delivered to them.

"2. The executive council ſhall be charged to notify this decree to Louis in the courſe of the day; to cauſe it to be executed in twenty-four hours after it ſhall have been notified to him; and to take every meaſure of ſafety and police which to them ſhall appear neceſſary during the execution; to be careful that no inſult be offered to the remains of Louis, and to give an account of their proceedings to the national convention.

"3. The mayor and municipal officers of Paris ſhall be enjoined to ſuffer Louis to communicate freely with his family, and to have with him ſuch prieſts as he may deſire in his laſt moments."

Theſe propoſitions were unanimouſly adopted, with an amendment by Briſſot, that the executive council ſhould not be called till eleven o'clock, and the ſitting cloſed at two o'clock in the morning.

On Sunday the twentieth, Garat miniſter of juſtice, the preſident and ſecretary of the council, and the mayor, waited on Louis, and notified to him the decree. When they had done reading, he addreſſed them with great compoſure, and drew from a portfolio a written paper containing the ſame in ſubſtance as his reply, which he delivered to them:

"I demand a delay of three days, that I may be able to prepare myſelf for appearing "before God; I demand, for this purpoſe, to be permitted to ſee freely the perſons whom "I ſhall point out to the commiſſioners of the commons; that this perſon may be ſecure "from all fear and from all uneaſineſs, for the act of charity which he ſhall perform to "me. I demand to be delivered from the perpetual inſpection which the council-general "has eſtabliſhed for ſome days paſt. I demand, during this interval, leave to ſee my "family when I ſhall deſire it, and without any witneſſes. I could wiſh that the national "convention would conſider with all ſpeed of the lot of my family, and permit them to "retire freely and conveniently wherever the convention ſhall think proper.

"I recommend to the benevolence of the nation, all the perſons who were attached "to me; there were many of them who expended their whole fortune on their ſituations, "and who having no longer any appointment, muſt be in neceſſity, and even ſome of "them who had no means of living but their appointments. Among the penſioners are "many aged perſons, women, and children, who had no other means of ſubſiſtence.

"At the tower of the Temple, January 1793. (Signed) Louis."

The convention having anticipated the requeſts concerning the intercourſe with his family and a clergyman, paſſed to the order of the day on the reſt.

Meanwhile the proviſionary executive council iſſued the following proclamation:—

"January the twentieth, 1793, Second Year of the Republic.—The proviſional executive council, deliberating on the meaſures to be taken for the execution of the decree of the national convention of the fifteenth, ſeventeenth, nineteenth, and twentieth of January, 1793, enacts the following regulations:

" I. The execution of the ſentence of Louis Capet ſhall take place to-morrow (Monday, January the twenty-firſt.)

" II. The place of execution ſhall be La Place de Revolution, ci-devant Louis XV. between the Pedeſtal and the Champs-Eliſees.

" III. Louis Capet ſhall ſet out from the temple at eight o'clock in the morning, ſo that the execution ſhall take place at noon.

" IV. The commiſſioners of the department of Paris, the commiſſioners of the municipality, and members of the criminal tribunal, ſhall aſſiſt at the execution, the ſecretary-regiſter of the tribunal ſhall draw up the minutes, and the ſaid commiſſioners, and members of the tribunal, as ſoon as the execution is over, ſhall come to give an account to the council, who ſhall continue in a ſtate of permanent ſitting during the whole day—By the proviſional executive council.

(Signed)—" Roland, Claviere, Monge, Le Brun, Garat, and Pache."

After paſſing Sunday in preparations for his approaching change, in the evening his family, from whom he had been ſeparated ſince the commencement of his trial, were conducted to the tower of the Temple, and allowed the ſad indulgence of a laſt interview, unmoleſted by the preſence of his guards. Alas! when imagination pictures the anguiſh of ſuch an interview, it is not neceſſary to look back on the former elevation of the ſufferer, in order to pity the gloomy tranſition in his fate! It is not neceſſary to recollect, that he who was the following morning to ſuffer death upon the ſcaffold, was once the firſt monarch of Europe, and would be led to execution through the ſtreets of his own capital! It is enough to conſider this unfortunate perſon as a man, a huſband a father! That anguiſh was not confined to the boſom of the king, the queen, and his ſiſter. The princeſs, his daughter, had attained that age when perhaps the ſoul is moſt ſuſceptible of ſtrong impreſſions, and its ſenſibility moſt exquiſite. Even the young prince, who was only in his ninth year, caught the infectious ſorrow.

The king had ſufficient firmneſs to avoid ſeeing his family on the morning of his execution. He deſired that the queen might be told that he was unable to bear the ſight of her and his children in thoſe laſt moments. He took a ring off his finger, which contained ſome of his own hair, of the queen's, and of his two children, and deſired it might be given to the queen. He called the municipal officers round him, and told them it was his dying requeſt, that Clery, his valet de chambre, might remain with his ſon. He then ſaid to Santerre, " Marchons;" and after croſſing, with an hurried pace, the inner court of the Temple, got into the mayor's carriage, which was in waiting; he was attended by his confeſſor, an Iriſh clergyman of the name of Edgworth, and appeared to have derived from his pious conſolations a conſiderable degree of calmneſs and fortitude; but beſide the ſoothing ſupport of religion, he is ſaid to have cheriſhed the hope to his laſt moment, that the people whom he meant to addreſs from the ſcaffold, would demand that his life ſhould be ſpared, and his confeſſor has been ſaid from miſtaken notions of compaſſion not to have diſcouraged the hope. After aſcending the ſcaffold with firm ſtep, twice the unhappy monarch attempted to ſpeak, and twice Santerre prevented him from being heard, by ordering the drums to beat. Alas! thoſe who ſympathiſed in his agonies had carefully ſhunned the fatal ſpot, and thoſe who ſurrounded him were ſteeled by the paſſions of the day againſt commiſſeration.

Two perſons who were on the ſcaffold have declared, that the unhappy monarch finding his hopes of awakening popular compaſſion fruſtrated by the impoſſibility of his being heard, as a laſt effort declared he had ſecrets to reveal of importance to the ſafety of the ſtate, and deſired he might be led to the national convention. Some of the guards who heard this declaration ſaid, "Yes, let him go to the convention!" others ſaid, "No, no!" Had he been permitted to return, it is probable that the conſequence might have been either a public and ſanguinary commotion, or additional ignominy and protraction of anguiſh in his laſt moments. Santerre, who foreſaw theſe conſequences, or perceived ſome danger, called to the executioner to do his office—Then it was that deſpair ſeized upon the mind of the unfortunate monarch—his countenance aſſumed a look of horror—twice with agony he repeated, "Je ſuis perdu! Je ſuis perdu!" ("I am undone! I am undone!") His confeſſor meantime called to him from the foot of the ſcaffold, "Louis, fils de Saint Louis, montez au ciel!" ("Son of Saint Louis, aſcend to heaven;") and in one moment he was delivered from the evils of mortality.

The executioner held up the bleeding head, and the guards cried 'Vive la Republi-"que!' The hair was ſold in ſeparate treſſes at the foot of the ſcaffold, and, as if every incident of this tragedy had been intended to diſplay the ſtrange viciſſitudes of human fortune, as if every ſcene were meant "to point a moral," the body was conveyed in a cart to the pariſh church of St. Madelaine, and laid among the bodies of thoſe who had been cruſhed to death on the Place de Louis XV. when Louis the ſixteenth was married, and of thoſe who had fallen before the chateau of the Thuilleries, on the tenth of Auguſt.

The grave was filled with quick-lime, and a guard placed over it till the corpſe was conſumed. The ground was then carefully levelled with the ſurrounding earth, and no trace or veſtige remains of that ſpot, to which, ſhrouded by the doubtful gloom of twilight, ancient loyalty might have repaired, and poured a tear, or ſuperſtition breathed its ritual for the departed ſpirit.

Thus fell Louis XVI. from the loftieſt ſummit of external grandeur to the loweſt and laſt ſtage of human misfortune and ignominy; his character has been touched upon in the courſe of this eventful hiſtory, wherein he has hitherto been the moſt conſpicuous actor; and it is beſt appreciated from a judgment of the tranſactions in which he was engaged; upon his fate the paſſions of the preſent day, will not perhaps allow the cordial and ſteady deciſion which hiſtory demands; but it is the duty of the hiſtorian, to appugn every partiality which would throw a veil over the ſolemn concluſions of juſtice and truth —to diſregard prejudices which impoſe upon the judgment by the antiquity of their exiſtence or the impunity with which they have been tolerated;—to reſiſt alike thoſe ſeductive emotions of benevolence which palliate errors becauſe they have been connected with power, and forgive the crimnal becauſe he has been puniſhed. To ſay that Louis was abandoned or profligate, would be to aſſert what is contradicted by the evidence of his whole life; neither was he that idiot which perſons more enrag d againſt his enemies, than juſt, have repreſented him; he was neither a vigorous tyrant nor a friend to the freedom of mankind; he was not deſtitute of talents, and the adroitneſs of his unpremeditated replies upon his examination before the convention, teſtify a depth and quickneſs of diſcrimination that diſplay at once the capacity of his mind, and the amazing power of habitual hypocriſy. Educated under circumſtances more ſuitable to his natural temper, he might have been an ornament to private ſociety; his deſtruction appears to have been principally the conſequence of his ſituation; the period of his adoloſcence, was marked by that indolence and ſelf indulgence, which obſcured his talents and acquired him the character of a ſenſual moraliſt and an economnical ſot; effects proceeding from his habits concurring with pre-exiſting cauſes, accompliſhed his fate; the long prevailing habits of the court were curbed at the commencement of his reign, by the religious demeanor of the king and the temporary reſtraint of his conſort; but they were not cured; they were not ſo much expoſed as under the reign of Louis XV. but they did not ceaſe to exiſt—they aſſumed new appearances, becauſe externally reſtrained by the cenſorious tribunal of an improving and philoſophical age.

Though the extravagance of his predeceſſors was not imitated by Louis himſelf, it was ſurpaſſed under the countenance of his careleſs temper, his pliancy was unfortunately favourable to the gratification of the ambitious and licentious deſires of his wife; devoted to her in affection, the ſuavity of his heart would not admit him to control her in promoting her own gratifications, nor to look forward to evils that former experience could not warn againſt; ſurrounded by men devoted to her ſervice, becauſe ſhe was all powerful, ignorant himſelf of mankind but as they appear in courts, and with counſellors equally ignorant and governed by different intereſts, it was not ſurpriſing that at a period when public diſtreſs had produced a ſpirit of enquiry, and the human mind had attained an unexampled expanſion and elaſticity, that ſo many cauſes ſhould produce an extraordinary criſis. That his temper was naturally benevolent, and his mind impreſſed with religious ſentiments, cannot be diſputed; that he was diſpoſed to promote the advantage of the people has been inſiſted on with great plauſibility; but it is fit to mark the true bounds of that diſpoſition; it did not extend to the ſacrificing of any one of his powers or prerogatives, not did his inclinations at any time favour an indulgence to the people, which would tend to reduce his income, or circumſcribe the arbitrary nature of the French ſovereignty. When he encouraged economy in the affairs of his houſehold, it was extolled as the greateſt condeſcention of the age, and men more prone to admire actions that have an apparent tendency to promote human good, becauſe they wiſhed to experience the like themſelves, never waited to conſider that this economy of Louis was the neceſſary conſequence of extravagance, of former profuſion, and a relaxed and abuſed adminiſtration of the public revenues. In like manner the meaſures of his reign which have been diſtinguiſhed in any degree by the enfranchiſement of the people from feudal oppreſſions, have been attributed ſolely to him; thus the meaſures adviſed by the great Turgot, had been placed to the credit of Louis alone. From the firſt period of the revolution to the laſt hour of his life, his ſoul revolted with indignation at every progreſſive ſtep of reformation; and it would be to believe what is more than human if we could credit to the contrary; the love of power is ſo intimately blended with the weakneſs of humanity, that no circumſtance can be expected to wean thoſe who poſſeſs it from the deſire to exerciſe it in the moſt extenſive latitude; men in power are ſo blind to their own imperfections that they affix a degree of infallibity to their actions, and they expect an implicit aſſent from all thoſe upon whom they operate. Oppoſition to them begets hatred, and the hatred becomes immortal. Louis was impreſſed with theſe fatal notions in no common degree, and even when he was ſpeaking with a view only to deceive, he ſeemed to carry the fatal and miſtaken impreſſion on his mind that he had the full credit of ſincerity; it was through this fatality that he could not find miniſters to confide long in him nor in whom he could long confide, from the moment that adverſity compelled him to activity. It would have been perhaps happier for him, and at leaſt more honorable to his reputation and diſcreditable to his enemies, had he acted a decided and manly part, on one ſide or the other; the vices of his education, the intrigues of the court in which he was converſant, and the peculiarity of his perſonal and domeſtic circumſtances oppoſed it. The plots in which he had engaged, the correſpondence which he maintained, his flight to Varennes, his declaration on that occaſion, made an indelible impreſſion of the faithleſſneſs of his character.

In a word his whole courſe of conduct too clearly proved his criminality, and juſtified the opinion of ſix hundred and ninety-three, who voted his guilt, out of ſeven hundred and nineteen members who were preſent on that occaſion.

His death was another ſerious criſis in the affairs of France, as it was the ſignal of party to renew the ſtruggle for power; an additional pretext for the powers hoſtile to France to renew the war with redoubled vigour; and for thoſe who had not yet openly eſpouſed the coalition to join the common ſtandard of kings.

Kerſaint and Manuel two diſtinguiſhed members of the convention, reſigned their ſeats upon the condemnation of Louis, and Roland retired from the place of miniſter for the interior. Pache was diſmiſſed from the war department and replaced by Bournonville. Pelletier de St. Fargeau a member of the convention, diſtinguiſhed alſo in the conſtituent aſſembly, and who had voted for the death of the king, was aſſaſſinated by one of the former garde-du-corps named Paris, the aſſaſſin fled; he was ſubſequently taken, but put a period to his exiſtence, having left a confeſſion of the fact written in his own blood, and acknowleging his motive to be revenge for the death of the king. The convention decreed public honours to the remains of Pelletier, and they were depoſited in the French pantheon in the place of Mirabeau's, whoſe correſpondence with the court had thrown a diſgraceful ſhade over his ſplendid talents.

The convention during the tranſactions of the trial, were not inattentive to other meaſures of great importance; the court of Great-Britain had from the confinement of Louis, manifeſted by the recall of its ambaſſador, a diſpoſition little ſhort of hoſtility. Indeed the conduct of that court and of Spain, were not calculated to produce any favourable diſpoſition in a people always impreſſed with confidence in themſelves and tenacious of their honour, but more eſpecially at that period, when their ſpirits appeared ſublimated by the enthuſiaſm of liberty, and the ſplendor of their victories at Jemappe and elſewhere. The language of Spain and England was arrogant and inſulting; the moderation of France, in reply to the latter, is remarkable. The meaſures of hoſtility on the part of England had however been actively concerting during the whole of the year 1792; upon the approach of the French troops to the neighbourhood of Holland, in the cloſe of that year, Auckland the Engliſh ambaſſador had intimated in a public meſſage from his court to the ſtadtholder an intention of adhering to the treaty offenſive and defenſive of 1788; this meſſage was delivered at the Hague on the ſixteenth of November, three days before a reſolution which we have before noticed, was paſſed in the convention: it was on the motion of Larevilliere Lepaux, which decreed fraternity with all nations, ſuffering or fighting for their liberties, and which was afterwards ſet up as a new ſubject of complaint by England.

The importance of the tranſactions between theſe two nations, however demand a minute detail, and for this purpoſe it will be neceſſary to embrace the whole ſubject, and to develope the various cauſes of the rupture real and aſſigned The firſt oſtenſible cauſe of complaint on the part of England, was the declaration of the French, by a decree of the ſixteenth of December 1792, that they would open the Scheldt, on the ſubject of which Chauvelin had delivered an official note on the twenty-ſeventh of the ſame month to the Engliſh miniſter. On this occaſion the French miniſter's communication was refuſed to be received, upon the alleged ground that as he had been appointed by Louis the Sixteenth, his functions muſt have ceaſed with the authority that created them. The Engliſh parliament had been haſtily aſſembled on the thirteenth of December, contrary to a previous adjournment to January; a reſpectable fleet already equipped, had been ordered to be reinforced with thirteen additional ſhips at the ſame time, and a number of veſſels laden with corn, belonging to French merchants from ports in the northern ſeas, that had put into England, were detained by an order of the Engliſh cabinet: a bill had been paſſed to prevent the circulation of any obligations repreſenting ſpecie, given under the authority of any power whatever in France, and another which enabled the executive to employ an extraordinary power in ſending aliens out of that country; theſe ſeveral acts too clearly manifeſted the deſigns of Great Britain, the alien law was in direct hoſtility with the treaty of 1786, between France and England, the fourth article of which, declared that the people of both nations ſhould have the free liberty of entering, travelling in, or reſiding in the ſtates of each other in Europe without paſſport or other authority.

The ſpeech of the Engliſh king at the opening of the winter ſeſſion of parliament in 1792, breathed the ſame ſpirit, but the leading articles of the Engliſh motives for arming and other meaſures of ſecurity were comprehended in the above decrees concerning the Scheldt, that of fraternity, and certain intentions imputed to the French government concerning Holland.

Anſwers were ordered to be given on theſe ſeveral points, to the Engliſh cabinet, wherein the executive council diſclaim the conſtruction which the miniſters of his Britannic majeſty had affected to put upon the decree of the ſixteenth of November, viz. "That the French convention had held out encouragement to excite to rebellion the ſeditious of all nations." They declare that the decree in queſtion "could not be applicable, but to the ſingle caſe, when the general will of a nation, clearly and unequivocally expreſſed, ſhould call for the aſſiſtance and fraternity of the French nation." With reſpect to the opening of the Scheldt, they obſerve, "That it is a queſtion abſolutely indifferent to England, that it is little intereſting to Holland, but that it is of the utmoſt importance to the Belgians." They aſſert the natural right of the people to the navigation of the river, and obſerve, that though the emperor and the houſe of Auſtria thought it proper to ſurrender this right, the people ought not to be bound by any authority they no longer acknowleged. They declare, however, "as the French nation has renounced all conqueſt, and only occupies the Netherlands during the war;" that as ſoon as the Belgic nation ſhall find itſelf in full poſſeſſion of its liberty, and when its general will may be declared legally and unfettered, then if England and Holland ſhall affix any importance on the opening of the Scheldt, the executive council will leave that affair to a direct negociation with the Belgians themſelves. If the Belgians, through any motive whatever, ſhall conſent to deprive themſelves of the navigation of the Scheldt, France will not oppoſe it.

It is of ſome importance, however, to trace theſe events to their proper ſources, that the motives of the parties may be perfectly underſtood, and on this occaſion the actual political ſtate of England is neceſſary to be diſplayed in order to comprehend the meaſures and motives of its government. It will alſo be neceſſary to examine the true grounds of the diſpute concerning the Scheldt, that it may be ſeen how far the parties were governed by the ſpirit of juſtice or hoſtility.

The Engliſh nation at this period may be conſidered as divided into three parties, the tories, or devoted advocates of the royal prerogative; the whigs, or aſſertors of the limited government of the monarch; and the republicans; the great body of the Engliſh people are perhaps as ignorant as thoſe of any nation of Europe, therefore they cannot be generally underſtood as comprehended to any conſiderable extent under either of theſe heads, but capable of being made the tools of either according to its predominancy. They then include thoſe only who take any part by thought, or act, in political affairs; and the tories were among theſe the moſt numerous, the republican the leaſt numerous but moſt active.

From the firſt dawn of the revolution it was decried by the tories and extolled by the republicans; the whigs purſued a mediate courſe, neither warm in its praiſe nor cenſorious; the tories had originally manifeſted their diſlike by ſullen doubts and equivocal obſervations, by that ridicule of the meaſures of the revolutioniſts which had been habitually applied to the French nation before, and by palliations of the enormities of the old French government; along with this that hatred of France which has been cradled in the Engliſh mind operated on the tories, who could never forgive France for having thrown her ſword into the ſcale of America and eſtabliſhed her independence; the tories rejoiced to ſee France torn by inteſtine diviſions, which they imputed ſolely to the principles of freedom, which ſhe had ſupported and encouraged, and thereby introduced into the body of her own country from the oppoſite ſhores of the Atlantic. The whigs on the contrary rejoiced in the eſtabliſhment of the limited monarchy, and were proud to hear the conſtitution of England ſet up as the model for France. The Engliſh republicans, though they diſapproved the monarchical inſtitution, rejoiced at even that approximation to freedom, and regarded with the moſt ſenſible regret every exceſs and intemperance which the convulſions of the revolution produced.

In this ſtate of party, though the tories were the moſt numerous of the three, they were the leaſt likely to obtain the confidence of that great body of the public which when at liberty acts more by the influence of a ſimple propoſition than abſtract reaſonings. The whigs, with the celebrity of their name, were the friends of liberty by long preſcription, and to them the generality of the nation looked for a conſtant control over the arbitrary encroachments of the court; the talents of that party were the moſt diſtinguiſhed of the nation, and they were led in parliament by men with whom none of the miniſters could cope in the fair conteſts of oratory and genius.

The monarch of the Engliſh government like the Deli-Lama, is but a puppet, or the viſible ſign of the national authority; his power never extends to the production of good, and the evil of his political exiſtence is conſtantly accumulating, and capable of being encreaſed either by his own weakneſſes or his vices. The power of the government is actually centred in an oligarchy, which ſupports the externals of ariſtocracy and democracy in conjunction with monarchy, by the ſecret operation of corruption of various kinds. This oligarchy is the privy council, and poſſeſſes the additional fatality that though the mode of its operation never varies, it is ſubject to the conteſts of party, and the power itſelf liable to be transfered from one ſet of men to another. Hence it ſubjects the nation to all the afflictions of faction, the rapacity of individuals, and the oppoſite ambition of oppoſite parties; without relieving the nation from the burdens of monarchy, or the dead burden of ariſtocracy.

At the head of the oligarchy of this period was a miniſter whoſe acceſſion to power was not the effect of talents or experience. By a fatuity perhaps peculiar to that ſaturnine nation, its fortunes have been often governed by circumſtances the moſt inſignificant, and contradictory. The reputation of the miniſter was wholly ſupported by his name, and with only this adventitious taliſman, did he for eight years hold ſovereign power over its affairs and involve its deſtinies, with the happineſs and peace of the civilized world. To him the ſtorms of war and of a revolution would be alike fatal; to the monarch a revolution only; but the exiſtence of the monarchy was eſſential to that of the miniſter, and hence it became the firſt care of both, to prefer a war. Theſe were the apparent diſpoſitions of the cabinet of England, when the flame of revolutionary enthuſiaſm glimmered round its ſhores.

The diviſion of the people upon the new principles, the overthrow of the hatreds againſt the French, ſo long ſubſiſting in the hearts of Engliſhmen, nouriſhed by prejudice, and foſtered by the horrible maxims of its government, grew daily more alarming to the king; and the ariſtocracy, the hierarchy, the beneficed clergy, the immenſe body of government officers, the penſioners, and proprietors of the public funds, were alike alarmed; the miniſter had not been idle in his efforts to ſpread terrors ſo fruitful for his views, and had by intrigue effected a ſchiſm among the whig party itſelf; theſe tranſactions would not be in themſelves worthy of notice did not the conſequences they led to and their effect upon the whole world require an elucidation of the means by which they were produced. A defection from a body ſo reſpectable muſt have excited the attention of the nation, and while that ſpirit was awake, one of the ſeceding whigs, irritated by various motives of jealouſy reſentment and avarice launched forth a publication on the meaſures purſued in France, calculated to alarm the public mind, provoke the angry paſſions, and to reinvigorate thoſe baſe hatreds that had been ſo recently looſened.

This work, the production of Burke, will live an eternal monumentof that lamentable turpitude which is ſo often united with great talents. Sarcaſms thrown out on his oratory by ſome wits of the conſtituent aſſembly, the ſuperiority that had been evinced in the trial of an oriental delinquent by Sheridan, and the indifference manifeſted for him by his long intimate friend Fox, appear to have been the real motives for his dereliction of character, and his oppoſition to every principle of civil liberty which he had ſupported with unrivalled energy in the courſe of the American revolution, and for his acception of a clandeſtine penſion from the government. This work and the meaſures of the miniſtry correſponding with it, a member of parliament (Sheridan) declared "in his conſcience he believed calculated to ſpread an alarm for the expreſs purpoſe of

"diverting the attention of the public for a while and afterwards leading them more eaſily into a war."

The production of Burke produced a reply in a few weeks from the pen of Thomas Paine, written with more moderation, and expoſing many abſolute falſehoods and miſrepreſentations; theſe works were univerſally read; Pain's work was conſidered as ſo complete a refutation of his antagoniſt, that not content with his triumph he determined "to carry the war into the enemy's country"—by a ſecond part of his "rights of man," which exhibited the Engliſh government as a picture of deformity that aſtoniſhed the people, and for a whole year palſied the government itſelf.

Miniſtry were ſtill active by every effort to reproduce that hatred of France which was eſſential to the exiſtence of the monarchy. The colonies were inſtructed on the mode of conduct to be purſued, their foreign alliances were ſtrenghtened, and the ſuſpenſion of the French monarch was the ſignal for developing the path that England had reſolved to purſue.

It was in vain that the ſplendid genius of Fox oppoſed the omnipotence of corruption; the generoſity of his heart and the expanſion of his mind, had not procured him that confidence which the better genius of his country would have inſpired; ſwayed by an ambition that would court power for the acquiſition of true glory, his public conduct, always governed by that lucid exactneſs which characteriſes the logic of his oratory, has been cenſured, becauſe he has been judged by principles different from thoſe upon which he muſt act or not act at all; hence he has been conſidered as the paraſite of kings—though he has never loſt the character of the friend of mankind—the vigorous oppoſer of the miniſter, and the ſuperſtitious admirer of the Engliſh conſtitution—a popular ariſtocrat, and a democratic loyaliſt—contradictions which truly ſpring from the heterogeneous compoſition of the government, and the abſolute impoſſibility of ſupporting uniformly what is always inconſiſtent in itſelf and forever varying its aſpects. Neither his talents, nor thoſe of the enlightened phalanx united with him, could reſiſt with effect, the ſecret counter-current nor that was undermining the peace of the nation and of the civilized world. The Engliſh people in the aggregate have long ceaſed to be actuated by ſentiments of freedom; the ambition and extravagance, of her kings and miniſters, her frequent unneceſſary and unprincipled wars, have heaped upon their ſhoulders an enormity of debt and taxes, under which all the generous affections have been buried; the ſpirit of urbanity is confined to a ſolitary opulent philoſophical few; prodigality marks the great, and the humble and induſtrious are compelled to a perpetual ſtruggle againſt neceſſity; the ſocial bond is broken, and even marriage is avoided from the apprehenſion of inability to provide for the offspring—hence they have become the moſt moroſe nation of Europe—the name of liberty is ſometimes heard, but its ſpirit has fled and left behind, only that ſtrutting egotiſm which exiſts upon ancient reputation after all the nobler paſſions have ceaſed to live. From ſuch a people ſo circumſtanced, Charles Fox could obtain but a fleeting eclat, nor was it to be expected that they ſhould perceive when he with prophetic voice foretold in tears their future humiliation, that he was then ſupporting liberty in her laſt expiring agonies.

Such was the condition of parties and the people of England, when after the tenth of Auguſt the Engliſh cabinet announced its diſapprobation of the internal tranſactions of France by the recal of her miniſter; after the victories of Jemappe and Spires, her conduct towards France became more calm and reſpectful; but the ſources of her fears were multiplied by the influence which thoſe victories obtained over public and private opinion; a communication with the French miniſter was then tolerated, nay ſome advances were made to him, and an amicable negociation actually opened between them; in the months of October and November, the Engliſh miniſter himſelf ſuggeſted the form and terms of an explanation, which would ſatisfy the court of St. James's on the matters complained of, and it was complied with.

But in December the ſcene changed, the parliament was ſummoned, the tower of London was fortified, and no other enemy was declared to be feared but a book the production of Thomas Paine, which it was aſſerted had turned the heads of every Engliſhman. The actual object was to alarm the people and to populariſe the intended meaſures of war. England that had beheaded a king and ſeveral queens, that had baniſhed a whole family for its ſpiritual belief, which had twice altered the deſcent, and placed a Frenchman, a Spaniard, a Dutchman, and a Hanoverian on the throne—was called upon to execrate a nation which was about to try its king for eſtabliſhed treaſons. From a crimination of the actions of the popular party in France, the tranſition to an hatred of the revolution was eaſy, and the war would then follow as a matter of national benignity: the meaſures of the tenth of Auguſt, the ſecond of September, and the execution of the king, were blended in one promiſcuous maſs of obloquy, and the paſſions of intereſt and fear, were called in to enflame the minds of the people:— the auſterity of the Britiſh cabinet gradually returned with theſe events; on the thirty-firſt of December, the French executive ordered a note to be preſented to the Engliſh miniſter, demanding "In the name of the French republic, a clear, ſpeedy and categorical anſwer, whether "under the denunciation of foreigners ſhe mentioned in a new bill (the alien act paſſed the twenty-ſixth of December) was meant to be comprehended the French; and that in "caſe of an anſwer in the affirmative, to declare that it was conſidered as an infraction "of the commercial treaty of 1786, and that the republic would thenceforward conſider "it as null and void."

Under whatever impreſſions the conduct of the two nations may be viewed, the difference of language between the French and the Engliſh miniſter is conſpicuous. The letters of Chauvelin are remarkable for their temperance and conciliatory ſpirit, thoſe of Grenville are marked with an arrogance and inſolence, that forms a very ſingular contraſt with the humiliating conceſſions which in four ſhort years after, chareſteriſed the overtures of the ſame man, to the ſame people in ſeeking for peace. If the language of Grenville was imperious and haughty in the higheſt degree, that which was employed by Auckland his Britannic majeſty's ambaſſador at the Hague, in a memorial preſented to the ſtates-general of the United Provinces, on the twenty-fifth of January, was totally without a precedent in hiſtory, as proceeding from one ſtate which wiſhed to be at peace with another. "Wretches aſſuming the title of philoſophers, who had the preſumption to think themſelves capable of eſtabliſhing a new ſyſtem of civil ſociety," and to "realize a dream of vanity," who "deſtroyed all received notions of ſubordination, manners and religion," were the mild and gentle terms by which the legiſlature of France was deſcribed in a public and official paper. They were further charged in this curious ſpecimen of diplomatic ability, with "imbecility and villainy!"—"Property, liberty, ſecurity, even life itſelf!" were ſaid to be "playthings in the hands of theſe infamous men, the ſlaves of the moſt licentious paſſions of rapine, enmity, and ambition."

The debates in the Engliſh parliament, left no room to doubt the infraction of the treaty by the alien bill; the trial of the king had formed the ground for refuſing to correſpond with the miniſter; but Chauvelin waving the etiquette of being accredited, ſolicited in very humble terms an interview with Grenville; but this was peremptorily refuſed, as was authoriſed by a clauſe in the bill alluded to. On the twenty-fourth of January he received an order to quit the kingdom, and to aggravate the inſult, the order was publiſhed in the London Gazette.

One of the moſt popular pleas of the Engliſh miniſtry for carrying on the war, was that the French firſt declared it; but ſuch acts of policy have been familiar to ſuch governments; by an article of the treaty of 1786, between France and England, the diſmiſſion of an ambaſſador from either country was agreed to be conſidered as a declaration of war.

It was a ſingular circumſtance, that while the Britiſh miniſtry refuſed to negotiate with an authoriſed agent of the French republic, they ſhould entertain communications with inferior perſons on theſe affairs, and even authoriſe lord Auckland to enter into a negotiation with general Dumourier. Such a proceeding we believe is unprecedented in diplomatic hiſtory; nor has any wiſe and able ſtateſman ever choſen to treat with thoſe on whom he could not depend, for the certainty of their propoſitions being ratified, when he had it in his power to ſettle the diſpute with the acting authorities of the ſtate themſelves. General Dumourier inſinuates, "that it is probable Mr. Pitt had no other deſign than to amuſe him, in order to gain time to make the neceſſary preparations for war;" and he adds, that "the treaty entered into by the court of St. James's with the court of Turin, at that very period, confirms the opinion."

The Briſſotine party who poſſeſſed the power at this period, appear beyond all doubt, ſolicitous to ſecure the neutrality of England; their own ſecurity againſt the mountain faction rendered it neceſſary. Perceiving the reluactnce of the Engliſh miniſtry to treat with Chauvelin, they had diſpatched Maret, under ſecretary for foreign affairs, to London; in his inſtructions he was authoriſed to offer unequivocally the conceſſion of three points —the navigation of the Scheldt, the repeal of the decree of the nineteenth of November, and that French troops ſhould not approach the Dutch frontiers within a given diſtance: But this miſſion, and thoſe conceſſions, were not capable of altering the purpoſes of the Engliſh miniſtry. Maret was diſpatched a ſecond time with more enlarged powers, he offered the ceſſion of ſome of the moſt valuable French colonies, the relinquiſhment of thoſe in the Eaſt-Indies, and, ſhould it prove mutually agreeable to the ſtates-general and the Belgic congreſs, to conſolidate their countries into one republic. But on this occaſion he was not permitted even to produce his credentials!

Nevertheleſs it was not until the firſt of February, upon the motion of Briſſot, that the national convention after recapitulating the aggreſſions of the Engliſh government decreed among other articles, "that George king of England, had never ceaſed ſince the revolution of the tenth of Auguſt, 1792, from giving to the French nation proofs of his enmity, and of his attachment to the concert of crowned heads; and that he had drawn into the ſame league the ſtadtholder of the United provinces: that, contrary to the firſt article of the treaty of 1783, the Engliſh miniſtry had granted protection and ſuccour to the emigrants and others, who have openly appeared in arms againſt France: that, on the news of the execution of Louis Capet, they were led to commit an outrage againſt the French republic, by ordering the ambaſſador of France to quit Great Britain: that the Engliſh have ſtopped ſeveral boats and veſſels laden with corn for France, whilſt at the ſame time, contrary to the treaty of 1786, they continue the exportation of it to other foreign countries; that in order to thwart more efficaciouſly the commercial tranſactions of the republic with England, they have by an act of parliament prohibited the circulation of aſſignats. The convention therefore declare, that, in conſequence of theſe acts of hoſtility and aggreſſion, the French Republic is at war with the king of England, and the ſtadtholder of the United Provinces."

The Engliſh court in a ſubſequent declaration, notwithſtanding the offers of the French government to relinquiſh the navigation of the Scheldt, and reſtore it to the footing upon which it had previouſly ſtood, made it a principal object of accuſation againſt the French nation. It is eſſential to the hiſtory to go back to the origin of this point of diſpute.

By the treaty of Weſtphalia of 1648, by the treaty of Utrecht and every ſubſequent treaty down to that of 1785, between the emperor Joſeph II. and the ſtates-general the navigation of the river Scheldt was veſted in the Dutch to the excluſion of the people of Belgia through whoſe populous country it flows; the celebrated city of Antwerp is ſeated on its banks, and while the Scheldt was free, was the emporium of European commerce; Amſterdam had riſen into conſequence from the moment of its decline. This misfortune to the Belgian people was one of the conſequences of that country falling under the dominion of the houſe of Auſtria, and of that fiction called the balance of power which has been the pretext for ſo many wars and ſo many afflictions to the nations of Europe. To ſecure the poſſeſſion of the Netherlands, the German ſovereign had ſacrificed without ſcruple not only the moſt inviolable rights of the Belgian people, but the very ſources of their opulence and proſperity, and the price of this ſacrifice was the guarantee of the ſurrounding nations. Maſter of thoſe beautiful provinces, he governed them with a rod of iron, and their exiſtence was a perpetual ſtruggle with the houſe of Auſtria, their poverty, and their hereditary love of liberty, the paſſions for which under all their oppreſſions remained undiminiſhed and deſcended from generation to generation. The labours of the hiſtorian are little more than the records of human inconſiſtency and the caprice of ſtateſmen; Joſeph II. in the year 1783, among the many ſingular and uſeful projects which he had formed, was that of opening the navigation of that river, and the reſtoration of that proſperity of which the Netherlands had been robbed by his anceſtors. And the Engliſh ambaſſador, ſir Joſeph Yorke, at that period went to Antwerp expreſsly for the purpoſe of inſtigating the people to petition the emperor that he ſhould conſent to the entire and free navigation of that river.

The abominable ſpirit of European diplomacy, however, altered the conduct of Joſeph and the deſigns of England; the movements of Pruſſia in the north alarmed the former, and he abondoned the Scheldt to its chains; the Engliſh court which had been deſirous of deſtroying Holland, for the prevalency of the French counſels in that country, in 1789; upon the reverſe of that predominancy in 1787, becauſe as adverſe to the opening of that river. That what ſhould appear ſufficiently important to call for the interference of one of the firſt diplomatiſts of England at one period ſhould become a ſufficient cauſe for involving a nation in war, in oppoſition ſo the principle of that interference, is perfectly conſiſtent with maxims of policy that makes the rights of nations and of individuals, articles of transfer and barter; but what appears moſt ſingular in the preſent inſtance is, that the Engliſh court ſhould feel more deeply intereſted in the prevention of the meaſure, than the ſtates-general of Holland whoſe citizens alone were benefited by the unnatural reſtriction.

Upon the commencement of the war between France and Auſtria, we have before ſeen how the latter were totally expelled from the Netherlands; the Belgians who had recently maintained an ineffectual ſtruggle oſtenſibly in ſupport of their religious liberties againſt Auſtria, and in which they were clandeſtinely ſupported by Engliſh money, warlike ſtores, and experienced officers; were by the French in the moment of victory put into full poſſeſſion of their civil freedom, the chains forged by Auſtria were broken; while Dumourier was triumphant in the field, he detached Labourdonnaye to Antwerp on the twenty-fifth of November; on the eighth of December, 1792, four French frigates and four cutters paſſed the fort of Lillo, and were ſaluted by cannon from the ramparts of Antwerp and the acclamations of the elated inhabitants of that noble city.

The emperor had preſented a note to the ſtates-general on the twenty-ſecond of November, and a ſecond on the firſt of December on the ſame ſubject, and the French had requeſted a paſſage for theſe ſhips; the ſtates refuſed the requeſt to the latter and notified the refuſal to the former, couched in ſuch terms as manifeſted no diſpoſition to make it the cauſe of a war.

We have ſeen the willingneſs of the French government to concede this topic of diſpute rather than enter into hoſtilities with England; we have ſeen the French miniſter diſmiſſed under circumſtances of inſult and ignominy; and we have ſeen them at the ſame time holding a communication with an inferior agent of the ſame government in Holland. With general Dumourier, who had upon the failure of that negociation, reſolved upon the conqueſt of Holland itſelf.

We have before remarked that the executive council had directed that general to reſpect the neutrality of Mæſtricht, although he had purpoſed no more than to poſſeſs it during the war only. The place was not then even palliſadoed, and it muſt have ſurrendered on the firſt ſummons; it was in the meantime put in a poſture of defence, and was garriſoned with ſeven thouſand men. On the twenty-fifth of January and eleventh of February, Auckland had, by official letters to the ſtates-general, intimated the commencement of hoſtilities; on the twelfth of February De Maulde and Noelle, who had entered into negociations which had for ſome time appeared favourable to a good underſtanding with France, quitted the Hague.

Dumourier determined to carry the decree of war againſt the ſtadholder into execution; and publiſhed a manifeſto addreſſed to the Batavian people, wherein he ſtates that their efforts to obtain their liberties which had failed in 1787, through the perfidy of the ſtadholder, the influence of the Engliſh, the intrigues of the court of Louis ſixteenth, and the power of thoſe Pruſſians under Brunſwick, whom he had ſince chaſed from the plains of Champaign, ſhould now be realized; that he came to make war againſt their tyrant and his cabal and to reſtore them to their liberties; that as their enemies encreaſed the rights of man would be diſſeminated, perſuaſion and victory would overwhelm deſpotiſm; that nations weary of waſting their blood and treaſures for a trifling number of individuals who keep up the ball of diſcord in order only to enſlave the people, would ſpurn their oppreſfors to obtain liberty and peace. That their demi-deſpot, who had ſacrificed their freedom and happineſs to his ambition, ſhould be brought to an account for his breach of the treaty of 1782, ſo injurious to Holland; for favoring the Engliſh commerce at the expence of that of his own country; for betraying the Dutch Eaſt India commerce to the ſame rapacious power; and calling upon the heroes of the Dogger-bank to erect their ſtandard conjunctly with ſixty thouſand victorious Frenchmen, who were entering Holland, not to conquer it but to reſtore it to liberty, as they had already reſtored Belgium."

The ſtates-general iſſued a counter-declaration, denying the aſſertions and pointing out falſhoods in this manifeſto; they ordered the moſt vigorous meaſures to be taken for repelling the invaſion, and the Engliſh cabinet embarked immediately a conſiderable body of troops under the command of the duke of York to ſupport them.

The eaſe with which Dumourier had effected the conqueſt of Belgium. and the eclat that the French army had obtained at Gemappe, aſſured an univerſal belief of an eaſy conqueſt of Holland. Had that general continued faithful, there is little doubt but that the project would have been attended with ſucceſs; but, on the other hand, there is ſome probability, that if certain arrangements had not been previouſly made with this celebrated commander, Great Britain and Holland would not have been ſo precipitate in entering into the diſpute. Thus both parties were poſſibly deceived in the commencement of the war. The French flattered themſelves with the immediate capture of Holland; while the allies, depending on the treachery of Dumourier, might look with confidence forward to no leſs an object than the immediate ſubjugation of France.

Circumſtanced as general Dumourier was at this period, it is difficult to aſcertain what was his plan of the campaign. He has himſelf intimated that it was long his fixed intention to effect an eſcape into ſome other country; and, with ſuch a deſign predominant in his mind, there is no probability that he would be very earneſt in promoting the ſucceſs of his expedition.

The general himſelf has in his memoirs ſtated two plans; the firſt of which was propoſed by the refugee Hollanders, who had formed a ſmall revolutionary committee at Antwerp, and who recommended an irruption into Zealand; the other was the plan which the general himſelf gives, as that which he really meant to purſue, while he appeared to favour that of the Batavian committee; and this was, to advance with a body of troops poſted at Mordyck, and maſking Breda and Gertruydenberg on the right, and Bergen-op-zoom, Steenberg, Klundert, and Williamſtadt on the left, to effect a paſſage over an arm of the ſea to Dort, and thus eaſily penetrate into the heart of Holland.

In the mean time general Miranda was ordered to advance with part of his army before Maeſtricht, but was inſtructed by general Dumourier not to attempt a regular ſiege at ſo unfavourable a ſeaſon, but to aſſault the place with bombs and red-hot balls; and after receiving intelligence that the commander in chief had paſſed Mordyck, to leave the continuance of the ſiege to general Valence, who was expected from Paris, and march with the utmoſt expedition to Nimeguen, and in paſſing the duchy of Cleves to intercept the Pruſſians, ſhould they have anticipated his arrival there. Venloo was at the ſame time to be attacked by general Champmorin, an experienced engineer.

It will remain for military readers to determine, whether, as ſo much of the ſucceſs of Dumourier's expedition depended on the rapidity of his movements, and the ſurpriſing of Holland at once by the invaſion of a conſiderable force, it was adviſeable or prudent to divide his army into many detachments, or to waſte any part of his time or force in beſieging places which did not lie directly in his route. Maeſtricht was inveſted early in February, by general Miranda, with twelve thouſand men on the banks of the Meuſe, and ſix thouſand on the right; and by the twenty-third of that month the works were all completed. On the following day the French general ſummoned the prince of Heſſe, who commanded there, but his anſwer was a direct refuſal to capitulate. The French then commenced a heavy fire from their batteries, and according to the account of the general, the town was on fire in ſeveral places. While the French were conſtructing their works, the garriſon made two ſallies, but with little ſucceſs.

We have before deſcribed the reduced and impoveriſhed ſtate of the armies of France, partly from the return of the national guards to the interior, but chiefly to a groſs neglect of the miniſter of war; as they continued however more numerous than their diſtreſſes would have given any reaſon to expect, Miranda continued to preſs the ſiege of Maeſtricht, while general Lanoue, with the covering army encamped at Havare. The head quarters of general Valence were at Liege, while his out poſts extended to Aix-la-Chapelle and the banks of the Roer. On the firſt of March general Clairfait, having paſſed the Roer in the night, attacked the French poſts as well on the ſide of Durn as on that of Juliers, and compelled them to retreat as far as Alderhaven, with the loſs of two thouſand men, twelve pieces of cannon, thirteen ammunition waggons, and the military cheſt. The following day, the archduke attacked ſeveral French batteries, and took nine pieces of cannon.

On the third, the prince of Saxe Cobourg obtained a ſignal victory over the French, and drove them from Aix-la-Chapelle even to the vicinity of Liege, with the loſs of four thouſand killed, ſixteen hundred priſoners, and twenty pieces of cannon. The French force ſeems indeed at this period to have been too much divided to make an effectual reſiſtance; and their officers appear to have had very bad intelligence of the motions of the enemy.

The defeat of the third was the ſignal for raiſing the ſiege of Maeſtricht. On the 4th, general Miranda learned, that the enemy was advancing with more than thirty-five thouſand men towards Wick, with the evident intention of throwing ſuccours into Maeſtricht. The general, therefore, had ſcarcely time to withdraw the body of three thouſand men, which were poſted there under the command of general Leveneur, before they were attacked by the advance guard of the enemy. The bombardment was however continued in the uſual manner, and Maeſtricht ſuffered conſiderably from the conflagration.

At twelve o'clock at night, Miranda gave orders for a general retreat, having ſent before him all the artillery, which happily arrived at Tongres, being covered with a rear-guard of four thouſand men, whom the enemy was unable to diſcompoſe.

On the ſucceeding day the French were again attacked at Tongres, and forced to retreat to Hans and St. Tron, where Miranda and Valence formed a junction; the latter having evacuated Liege, and abandoned it to the enemy. They were alſo joined by the troops under generals Iſler, Lamorliere, and Champmorin; and after remaining there till the eighth, to refreſh, and having repulſed the advance guard of the enemy, who attempted to diſlodge them, they moved on that day towards Tirlemont.

In this critical ſituation of affairs general Dumourier ought to have abandoned his enterpriſe againſt Holland, and moved with his whole force to the ſupport of the flying generals. On the contrary, he left his army under the command of general de Flers, "whom," he ſays, "he knew to be incapable of diſcharging the truſt," with orders to take up his quarters at Dort. The army in Holland was totally diſpirited by the departure of the general; the Dutch navy in the mean time was reinforced, and the Pruſſians advanced by the way of Bois-le-duc. Inſtead of proceeding to Dort, De Flers was compelled to throw himſelf into Breda, with ſix battalions and two hundred cavalry, and the reſt of the army retired to Antwerp.

The ſatisfaction expreſſed by the army in Liege on being re-joined by their former victorious commander, is ſcarcely to be deſcribed; order and confidence ſeemed to be at once eſtabliſhed; and the hopes of the ſoldiery anticipated a renewal of the glories of Gemappe. The ſtrength and vigour, however, of the French army were gone, and their commander was no more the fame Dumourier who had triumphantly overrun the Netherlands in the preceding year.

On the fifteenth of March the Auſtrians attacked Tirlemont, in which the French had only four hundred men, and which they carried after an obſtinate reſiſtance, the town being large and incapable of defence. On the following day, however, they were again driven from that place by general Dumourier, and compelled to retreat to St. Tron. On the eighteenth a general engagement took place at Neerwinden; the French army being covered by Dormael, and on the right by Landen. The action continued with great obſtinacy on both ſides, from ſeven in the morning till five in the evening, when the French were obliged to fall back, and the Auſtrian cavalry coming up, put them entirely to flight. The loſs in each army was great. The French diſplayed conſiderable courage and addreſs, but were overpowered by numbers, and perhaps by the treachery of their own commander, more than the ſuperior ſkill and diſcipline of their enemies. Dumourier himſelf, in a letter to general Duval, ſays of this battle, that he attacked the enemy in the famous plain of Neerwinden, and fought the whole day with his right wing and centre. The left wing (which was commanded by general Miranda) he aſſerts, not only fought ill, but abandoned him and fled beyond Tirlemont. In his memoirs the general aſſerts, that general La Marche committed the firſt error of the day. He entered the plain of Landen, according to his inſtructions; but finding no enemy there, he made a movement to the left, to fall upon the village of Oberwinde, and thence was thrown into confuſion by the ſecond column. General Valence, who commanded the French cavalry was wounded, and obliged to retire to Tirlemont, but they were ſtill victorious over the Auſtrian horſe. He repeats the charge againſt general Miranda of having retreated while his troops were quite freſh, and attributes this defection to a jealouſy of general Valence.

Miranda, however, in a confidential letter to Petion, dated the twenty firſt of March, very directly intimates his ſuſpicion of treachery in the commander in chief. He ſays that Dumourier, who had before never failed to conſult him upon every occaſion, did did not even mention the arrangements for the battle of Neerwinden to him. "At eleven at night," ſays he, "my orders were delivered in writing, and I learnt in a converſation with him, that we were to offer battle to an enemy fifty-one thouſand ſtrong, very advantageouſly poſted, and a formidable artillery, with a force inferior to theirs, and with every disadvantage of situation and encampment—all this was to be effected without having previously reconnoitred the ground, or the particular position of the enemy." Miranda proceeds to assert, that he made a vigorous attack in five different columns, three of which were led on by himself; and that at last his troops, after fighting a considerable time with various success, were obliged to give way to superior force: and that they did not abandon the field in a cowardly manner, the loss which this division sustained may be cited as a proof, since it amounted to not less than two thousand in killed and wounded. The whole of the loss Dumourier states at more than three thousand; and that of the Imperialists at fourteen hundred. The French also lost a great part of their cannon.

The battle of Neerwinden was fatal to the French; for, besides the loss above stated the general observes that upwards of six thousand men immediately deserted, and proceeded towards Brussels and France. The retreat of the French was, however, made in good order, and they continued skirmishing till they reached Godsenhoven, which is about one league south of Tirlemont. Here the French formed in order of battle, and the two armies rested the whole night upon their arms. On the nineteenth but little was done, and on the night of the twentieth Dumourier took possession of the heights of Cumpitch, behind Tirlemont, from which place he had to withdraw his provisions and magazines.

As the general, however, if we may trust his own account, clearly perceived that he could not long maintain himself in this position, and that it afforded no protection either to Louvain or Brussels, he availed himself of the twentieth, while the Austrians still remained before Tirlemont, to pass the Welpe and encamp near Banterlem, having his right at Op and Neerwelpe, and his left on the heights, and in the woods in front of Zuellenberg. Here he was attacked by the advance guard of the enemy, who were however repulsed. While the general was engaged in repelling this assault, Danton and La Croix arrived in the camp, as commissioners from the convention; and after receiving some explanation from him relative to a letter which he had written to the convention on the affairs of Belgium, they returned.

On the twenty-first Dumourier judged it proper to take post nearer Louvain, and on the following day he was attacked by the enemy. The action was bloody, and lasted the whole day; but the Imperialists were compelled to retreat with great loss. On the evening preceding this action, general Dumourier sent colonel Montjoye to the headquarters of the prince of Cobourg, to treat respecting the wounded and prisoners. "He there (continues Dumourier) saw colonel Mack, an officer of uncommon merit, who observed to colonel Montjoye, that it might be equally advantageous to both parties to agree to a suspension of arms. Dumourier, who had deeply considered the situation of his army, sent Montjoye again to colonel Mack on the twenty-second, to demand if he would come to Louvain, and make the same proposition to Dumourier. Colonel Mack came in the evening. The following articles were verbally agreed to: first, that the Imperialists should not attack the French army in great force, nor general Dumourier again offer battle to the Imperialists. Secondly, that on the faith of this tacit armistice, the French should retire to Brussels slowly, and in good order, without any opposition from the enemy. And lastly, that Dumourier and colonel Mack should have another interview after the evacuation of Bruſſels, in order to ſettle further articles that might then be mutually deemed neceſſary."

Either diſtruſtful of Dumourier, however, or from other motives; the Imperialiſts, under general Clairfait, attacked an advanced guard of the French, poſted at Pellenberk; in conſequence of which the latter were obliged to abandon Louvain, and general Dumourier tranſported his wounded, and the flour for his army, in boats to Mechlin. The French army effected their retreat towards Bruſſels in the night; otherwiſe Dumourier himſelf ſtates, to the honour of his new allies, "that notwithſtanding the verbal ſtipulations agreed to by colonel Mack, they would probably have ſeized upon this opportunity to deſtroy, or entirely diſperſe the French army."

Dumourier, it appears, continued faithfully to obſerve, on his part, the terms of the agreement; and he alſo allows that the prince of Cobourg ſo far adhered to them, that he remained three days at Louvain, ſending only ſmall detachments to hang on the rear-guard of the French. On the twenty-fifth general Dumourier, with his army, paſſed through Bruſſels. The citadel of Antwerp was the only fortified place he was able to keep, which he garriſoned with two thouſand men, and ſix months proviſions, in order to preſerve a communication with the troops which had been left in Breda and Gertruydenberg. His deſign, he ſays, was to have formed a ſtrong line without the territory of France, to the left by Namur, Mons, Tournay, Courtray, Antwerp, Breda, and Gertruydenberg, till he could recruit his forces; but the line in one part was broken by the neceſſary evacuation of Namur.

On the twenty-ſeventh the general arrived at Ath, where he received orders from the convention to arreſt the colonel of the ſeventy-fifth regiment of infantry, and general Miranda. On the ſame day colonel Mack came to Ath. A further agreement was then entered into between that officer and Dumourier, the terms of which were—"that the French army ſhould remain ſome time longer in poſſeſſion of Mons, Tournay, and Courtray, without being haraſſed by the Imperial army; that general Dumourier, who did not conceal from colonel Mack his deſign of marching againſt Paris, ſhould, when their deſign was ripe for execution, regulate the motions of the Imperialiſts, who ſhould only act as auxiliaries in the execution of their plan; that in the caſe of Dumourier's having no need of aſſiſtance, which was greatly deſired by both parties, the Imperialiſts ſhould not advance farther than the frontier of France, and that the total evacuation of Belgium ſhould be the price of this condeſcenſion; but if Dumourier could not effect the re-eſtabliſhment of a limited monarchy (not a counter-revolution), he himſelf ſhould indicate the number and the kind of troops which the Imperialiſts ſhould furniſh, to aid in the project, and which ſhould be entirely under his direction.

"Dumourier made colonel Mack acquainted with his deſign of marching the following day to Tournay, with the march of general Neuilly to Mons, and of the army of Holland and Namur.

"It was finally decided, that in order to combine the operations of the Imperial troops under the prince of Cobourg, and thoſe under the prince of Hohenloe, at the time when Dumourier ſhould march to Paris, Condé ſhould be put into the hands of the Auſtrians as a pledge; that the Auſtrians ſhould garriſon the town, but without any pretenſions to the ſovereignty; and on the condition that it ſhould be reſtored to France at the concluſion of the war, and after an indemnity ſhould have been ſettled between the two parties; but that all the other towns belonging to France ſhould, in the caſe of the conſtitutional party needing the aſſiſtance of the Imperialiſts, receive garriſons, one half which ſhould be French troops, and the other half Imperialiſts, under the orders of the French. General Valence, general Thouvenot, the duke of Chartres, and colonel Montjoye, aſſiſted at this conference."

General Dumourier arrived on the twenty-eighth at Tournay, and here he learned that general Neuilly's diviſion had abandoned Mons, and thrown themſelves into Condé and Valenciennes. Here he found madame d'Orleans whom he ſays he had never till then ſeen. The deſigns of Dumourier did not, however, paſs unſuſpected at Paris: three commiſſioners from the executive power had therefore been diſpatched under the pretence of conferring with the general on the affairs of Belgium, but really with a view of ſounding his intentions. They found him at Tournay in company with madame Sillery, young Egalite, and Valence, and ſurrounded with deputations from the diſtrict of Cambray. The interview was violent. Dumourier expreſſed himſelf in terms of invective againſt the Jacobins. "They will ruin France," ſaid he, "but I will ſave it, though they ſhould call me a Cæſar, a Cromwell, or a Monk." The commiſſioners carried the converſation no farther. They departed, and returned next day, determined to diſſemble, in order to diſcover the extent of his views. The general then became more explicit; he ſaid that the convention were a herd of ruffians, whom he held in abhorrence —that the volunteers were poltroons; but that all their efforts would be vain. "As for the reſt," added he, "there ſtill remains a party. If the queen and her children are threatened, I will march to Paris—it is my fixed intention—and the convention ſhall not exiſt three weeks longer!" The commiſſioners aſked him by what means he would replace the convention? His anſwer was, "The means are already formed." They aſked him whether he did not wiſh to have the laſt conſtitution? He replied, that it was a fooliſh one; he expected a better from Condorcet: the firſt conſtitution, with all its imperfections, was preferable. When they aſked him whether he wiſhed to have a king, he replied—"We muſt have one." He alſo told them, that he was employed to make peace for France; that he had already entered into a negotiation with the prince of Cobourg for an exchange of priſoners, and for the purpoſe of withdrawing from Holland thoſe eighteen battalions, which were on the point of being cut off. When they informed him that thoſe negotiations with Cobourg, and the peace which he wiſhed to ſecure for France, would not change republicans into royaliſts, he repeated the aſſertion that he would be in Paris in three weeks; and obſerved, that ſince the battle of Gemappe he had wept over his ſucceſs in ſo bad a cauſe. Dubuiſſon, one of the commiſſioners, then propoſed to communicate to him a plan of a counter-revolution: but he ſaid that his own was better; that he would make the conqueſt of Belgium for himſelf, which he would rule under the protection of the houſe of Auſtria.

The converſation of Dumourier with theſe commiſſioners was no ſooner made known in Paris, than the ſuſpicions of thoſe who entertained apprehenſions of his treachery were now converted into reality. The general himſelf had been previouſly ſummoned to the bar of the convention; he was to be ſuperceded by Bournonville, the miniſter of war; and four commiſſioners were ſent to the army of the north, with powers to ſuſpend and arreſt all generals and military officers whom they ſhould ſuſpect, and bring them to the bar.

As the commiſſioners wiſhed to proceed with caution, they halted at Liſle; and diſpatched a ſummons to the general to appear in that city, and anſwer the charges againſt him. The general, however, had already arranged his plan; the Rubicon was paſſed; and he returned only for anſwer, that he could not leave the army for a moment, while the enemy was cutting him off from every retreat—that he would only enter Liſle to purge it of thoſe traitors who infeſted it—and that he valued his head too much to ſubmit it to an arbitrary tribunal.

On the twenty-ninth of March, general Dumourier learned that Antwerp had been abandoned by the troops which he had ſtationed there; and that they had effected their retreat to the territories of France. On the following day, he reſolved to raiſe the camp at Tournay, and occupy that of Maulde. In the mean time he ſent orders through colonel Mack to the garriſons of Breda and Gertruydenberg to capitulate, on condition of being allowed to march back to France. He alſo ordered general Miaczinſki, who was at Orchies, to march with his diviſion to Liſle, and arreſt the commiſſioners of the convention; but that general, imprudently divulging the object of his miſſion, no ſooner entered the city than the gates were ſhut upon him; he was ſent to Paris, and brought to the ſcaffold. By the patriotiſm of generals Ferrand and Ecuyer, Dumourier was alſo fruſtrated in an attempt to render himſelf maſter of Condé and Valenciennes.

The attempt to arreſt an able general at the head of his army was bold at leaſt, and indeed did not argue a ſuperior degree of wiſdom in the agents of the convention. The commiſſioners, nevertheleſs, proceeded on the firſt of April to St. Amand, the head quarters of Dumourier, and, being admitted to his preſence, explained to him the object of their miſſion. After a conference of ſome hours, the general, not finding that he could perſuade them to favour his intentions, gave the ſignal for a body of ſoldiers who were in waiting, and ordered the miniſter of war, Bournonville (who was ſent to ſuperſede him), and the commiſſioners, Camus, La Marque, and Quinette, immediately to be conveyed to general Clairfait's head quarters at Tournay, as hoſtages for the ſafety of the royal family.

Dumourier notwithſtanding his ſplendid talents, appears, however, to have been groſsly miſtaken with regard to the diſpoſition of his army. They might he diſpoſed to reſent the affront which was ſo imprudently offered to their general, in ordering him to appear as a criminal at Paris; but when he came to propoſe to them the reſtoration of royalty in the perſon of the prince, and to turn their arms againſt their country, the patriotiſm of Frenchmen reſumed its wonted influence, and they conſidered it as their duty to diſobey. The general loſt no time in diſpatching colonel Montjoye to acquaint colonel Mack with the arreſt of the commiſſioners, and to appoint the time and place for a conference to conclude the terms of their treaty. During the night he compoſed a manifeſto addreſſed to his army, which he digeſted and put in order the following day.

On the morning of the third he went to the camp, and addreſſed the troops, who, he ſays, appeared to approve his conduct. He then proceeded to St. Amand in which place was the corps of artillery, who alſo expreſſed their ſatisfaction. At St. Amand, general Dumourier thought it prudent to ſleep, for the purpoſe of marking his confidence in the troops there.—The whole of the third, he ſays, paſſed with as much ſucceſs as he could expect; except that murmurs were heard among ſome of the battalions of the volunteers,

On the morning of the fourth he left general Thouvenot at St. Amand, and departed himſelf for Condé; but he had not approached that fortreſs within half a league, before he was met by an officer diſpatched by general Neuilly to inform him that the garriſon was in the greateſt fermentation, and that it would not be ſafe for him to enter the place. He ſent back the officer with an order to general Neuilly, to ſend the eighteenth regiment of cavalry to eſcort him. He had juſt before overtaken a column of volunteers marching towards Condé, who, however, did not then attempt to moleſt him. While they were yet in ſight it was that general Neuilly's meſſenger arrived; and he had ſcarcely delivered his meſſage to the officer, when the head of the column quitted the high road, and ran towards him with ſhouts and menaces, and a univerſal acclamation of 'Stop, ſtop,' The general now perceiving himſelf in the moſt imminent danger, mounted a horſe belonging to a domeſtic of the duke de Chartres, and eſcaped through a dreadful diſcharge of muſketry, which the whole column poured upon him and his aſſociates.

Finding it impoſſible to gain the camp of Maulde, the general proceeded along the Scheldt, and paſſed the ferry near the village of Wick, on the imperial territory. From this place he continued his route on foot to Bury, where in the evening he met colonel Mack, and paſſed the night in digeſting the proclamation of the prince of Cobourg, which appeared on the fifth with that of general Dumourier. It was alſo agreed in this conference, that as ſoon as the general ſhould be maſter of Condé, he ſhould deliver it to the Auſtrians, to ſerve as a magazine and place of arms, in caſe of aid being demanded by general Dumourier.

The proclamation of general Dumourier contained a recapitulation of his ſervices to the French Republic; a ſtatement of the cruel neglect which his army had experienced in the preceding winter, and of the outrages practiſed by the Jacobins towards the generals of the republic, and particularly towards himſelf; the reaſons which induced him to arreſt the commiſſioners; and a glowing picture of the evils to be apprehended from a continuance of anarchy in France. It concluded with an exhortation to the French, to reſtore the conſtitution of 1789, 1790 and 1791; and a declaration on oath that he bore arms only for the reſtoration of that conſtitution; and that as ſoon as he had affected that purpoſe, he would for ever abandon every public function, and in ſolitude conſole himſelf with having contributed to the happineſs of his fellow citizens.

The manifeſto of the prince of Saxe Cobourg, which accompanied it, paſſed high encomiums on the diſintereſted and patriotic views of general Dumourier. It announced that the allied powers were no longer to be conſidered as principals, but merely as auxiliaries in the war; that they had no other object but to co-operate with general Dumourier in giving to France her 'conſtitutional king and the conſtitution ſhe formed for herſelf.' On his word of honour he pledged himſelf, that he would not come upon the French territory to make conqueſts, but ſolely for the ends above ſpecified.

The prince declared further, that any ſtrong places which might be put into his hands ſhould be conſidered as ſacred depoſits, to be delivered up as ſoon as the conſtitutional government ſhould be eſtabliſhed in France, or as ſoon as general Dumourier ſhould demand them.

On the fifteenth of April, at day-break, general Dumourier proceeded with an eſcort of fifty Imperial dragoons to the advanced guard of his camp at Maulde. He harangued his troops; but though there was no open oppoſition, he obſerved ſome indications of that ſpirit, and ſeveral factious groupes aſſembled in different parts. His next deſign was to go to St. Amand; but as he was entering the city he was met by an aid-de-camp, who informed him that during the night the corps of artillery, excited by ſome emiſſaries from Valencinnes, had riſen upon their general, and were marching to that fortreſs. The money, however, and the equipages of the officers, which remained in the city without a guard, he commanded to be conducted to Rumegies.

The deſertion of the corps of artillery was the ſignal for general revolt. General Lamorliere, on whom Dumourier had placed ſome dependance, immediately took his departure for Valenciennes. The general was himſelf at Rumegies, when he heard of the defection of the troops in camp. Nothing was now left but to provide for his perſonal ſafety. He mounted his horſe attended by general and colonel Thouvenot, young Egalite, colonel Montjoye, and a few others of his ſtaff. He was followed in the courſe of the day by about ſeven hundred horſe and eight hundred infantry; theſe were the whole that could be prevailed on by the utmoſt ſolicitations of their officers to deſert to the enemy, and of theſe ſeveral afterwards returned.

The military cheſt which Dumourier had removed was recovered by a party of French chaſſeurs, who brought it to Valenciennes. At Bury general Dumourier found colonel Mack, and proceeded with him to Mons, It was agreed that the Imperialiſts ſhould immediately lay ſiege to Condé. The rank of feld-zeugmeiſter, (general of artillery) was conferred on Dumourier, but the ſuſpicions of the allies never permitted him to enjoy it in any active capacity:—and he now exiſts a leſſon to all men who forſake the ſteady path of integrity, an outcaſt of ſociety.

Hiſtory which dwells with fond partiality on the virtuous and heroic actions of the patriot hero—reluctantly deſcends to exhibit the union of ſplendid talents with perfidy. Dumourier was born at Cambray in 1739, his father was a poor nobleman, and had educated his ſon with great care and deſtined him for the army, into which he entered in his eighteenth year, and in his twenty-ſecond was already honored with the croſs of St. Louis and had received twenty-two wounds in battle. Upon the peace of 1763 he travelled through various parts of Europe; by his enemies it has been aſſerted, as a ſpy from the court; by himſelf, for the purpoſe of ſtudying mankind, the languages and manners of nations. He ſerved in Corſica in 1768 and 1769, and was there promoted to the rank of colonel; and in 1770 he was appointed by Choiſſeul miniſter to the confederates of Poland, and commanded a body of troops in their ſervice for two campaigns. In 1772 he was employed to reviſe and correct the military code; and at the end of the ſame year was entruſted expreſsly by Louis XV. with the management of the ſecret negociation iu Sweden which produced the revolution there. This miſſion was given him by the king without the knowlege of his miniſter, and the duke d'Aiguillon had him conducted from Hamburg to the Baſtile, for the ſhare he had in it; where the irreſolute and baſe king, under the influence of his concubine Du Barre, ſuffered him to remain, and to ſuſtain the weight of a proſecution without acknowleging the powers which he had ſecretly given him. After ſix months confinement, he was baniſhed to the caſtle of Caen for three months; meanwhile Louis XV. died, d'Aiguillon was diſgraced, and Louis XVI. directed a reviſion of his trial by meſſieurs Du Muy, De Vergennes, and Sartine, whoſe report acquitted him. He was ſent to Liſle with his former rank, to examine a new plan of diſcipline brought from Pruſſia, and appointed one of a commiſſion for improving the navigation of the Lys, and for forming a harbour at Ambleteuſe. In 1776, he was joined with d'Oiſy, a naval officer, and Roziere, one of the firſt engineers in Europe, to determine upon a proper place for a naval port in the Channel oppoſite the Engliſh coaſt; and the year 1777, which he ſays was the only period of repoſe he had enjoyed in his life, he ſpent at his villa of Clichy, twenty leagues from Paris. In 1778 he was appointed commandant of Cherbourg, which he had conſidered as the fitteſt ſcite for a naval port, and continued to ſuperintend its execution thence to the commencement of the revolution.

The extraordinary viciſſitudes of the revolution called him from that ſubordinate ſtation, into a field of action where his talents united with probity, might have ſecured him an immortality in hiſtory. But his education was adapted for the wiles and inſincerity of courts. His character had two leading traits; intrigue and vanity; the one entered ſo deeply into all his habits, that it appeared irkſome to diſpenſe with it in the moſt ordinary tranſactions, and the other was ſo exceſſive as to ovebear his duplicity, and diſplay an egotiſm that expoſed his merits to diſreſpect. Fortune and the enthuſiaſm of his country concurring with his military ſkill, had bound his brows with the laurels of victory; his glory was too ſudden and exalted for the texture of his mind, he became giddy when he looked down to his former obſcurity, and the attention which he found beſtowed on him by thoſe powers of Europe whom he had been habituated to view with diſtant awe and reverence, while it ſatiated his ruling paſſion, obſtructed every approach of prudence and magnanimity.

Foreign nations while they refuſed to acknowlege the republic, ſent their agents to his camp, and while they affected to diſdain a treaty with the executive council, were anxious to negociate with the general. Since the revolution he had not only reprobated ariſtocracy and monarchy, but had diſclaimed the nobility of his family of which he was ſecretly proud, but the diſguiſe of philoſophy which he aſſumed was ſo thin, that thoſe who ſaw him intimately, eaſily diſcovered, that though he could ſacrifice the monarch for his ambition that he would alſo ſacrifice liberty for the tinſil and drapery of courts. He was not only covetous of great but of little diſtinctions. He received every kind of homage which military ſubordination exacts, and exulted no leſs in accidental honours, than thoſe to which genius is entitled.

The accompliſhed and immortal wife of Roland has given a happy ſketch of this man; 'he had a great ſhare of what is called wit, but little morality; diligent and brave; an able general, a thorough-paced courtier, a good writer, a ready ſpeaker, and capable of great undertakings; but he wanted a cool head and firm mind to execute what he undertook: good humoured with his friends, and ready to cheat every one of them, he was altogether formed for the intrigues of a corrupt court.'

The events in which he has been concerned display the truth of this vigorous outline, and that addreſs with which he could accommodate himſelf to any principles; thus it was, that he was a boiſterous Jacobin and a ſimple Girondiſt at the ſame time: as a miniſter we have ſeen him the private favorite of the king and queen, and yet calling the moſt decided republicans to adminiſtration; when thoſe miniſters propoſe a camp near Paris he adviſes their diſmiſſion, and ſoon after reſigns himſelf becauſe their advice is not adopted; the moſt inveterate among the violent enemies of Lafayette, and the loudeſt in reproach of his deſertion, he is appointed to ſucceed to the command of the ſame army, and he endeavors to betray it under circumſtances of tenfold perfidy; proclaiming the pureſt principles of republican equity, anathematiſing tyrants and ariſtocrats, and fighting immortal battles under the ſtandard of freedom, he conſpires againſt his country, its liberty, and the aſſociates of his victories, with thoſe very tyrants; even in the memoirs written for his juſtification, the crimes he acknowleges prove only the moderation of thoſe who had denounced his criminal deſigns; he was in Paris from the firſt to the twenty-ſixth of January, and he employed the principal part of that time in compoſing four laborious memorials calculated to promote order and energy in ſo many departments of the adminiſtration, and the ſecurity of the government; yet he alſo acknowleges, that at the ſame period with a view to ſave the king, he had offered to the Girondiſts to march twenty thouſand men to Paris—that he had tendered the dictatorſhip to Robeſpierre—and propoſed to the Jacobins to overturn the convention, raiſe themſelves upon its ruins, and become the arbiters of France and Europe.

After ſo monſtrous an aſſociation of deſigns, ſo contradictory with each other, ſo atrocious in themſelves, his laſt act of perfidy ceaſes to be ſurprizing: the leſſon which he exhibits of the treachery and duplicity attached to ariſtocratic habits, ſhould never be forgotten by republicans: his public character forms altogether ſuch an hideous picture of political depravity that hiſtory will not condeſcend to enquire, whether he poſſeſſed one quality in private life worthy of pity or regret.

The news of the defection of Dumourier arrived at Paris when the animoſities of party had gained the moſt alarming appearence; in great revolutions, the paſſions are all awake and reaſon is but a light auxiliary that offers plans, which are executed or rejected by enthuſiaſm; confidence generally attaches to thoſe who addreſs themſelves to the predominant affection; and if the people commit exceſſes, thoſe who undertake to defend them become more dear than thoſe who are ſolicitous only for their reputation and their rights. All parties are from the very nature of the human character and ſociety compoſed of very oppoſite characters, though adhering by one common tie in oppoſition to another; both the parties in the convention diſplayed each within itſelf this admixture; we have ſeen that on the queſtions concerning the king the Girondiſts were divided among themſelves; the ſame remark applies to their opponents. After that event the reſpective parties had become more compact; from the neceſſity of ſtemming the ſtrong power of the other, the conteſt became more afflicting and ruinous. The Girondiſts had the reins of power in their hands, and power is always neceſſarily liable to cenſure. To relieve themſelves from the odium of many unavoidable acts of rigour, and to gain the weighty influence of the city of Paris, they had procured a decree veſting in the commune of that city, the power of arreſt, and placed at their diſpoſal the whole armed force. A ſtep more impolitic in every reſpect could not have been taken, conſidering that the three principal members of the Mountain, Danton, Robeſpierre, and Marat, though each reciprocally jealous of or deteſting the other, were actually the moſt popular men in the fections. The Girondiſts ſoon perceived their error, and at an evening ſitting of the convention, when the executive council were delivering an account of ſome diſturbances that had taken place, one of the miniſters obſerved that the executive council could not be reſponſible for what might happen on any occaſion of tumult, ſince they were not poſſeſſed of means of force to control or command events; Genſonne, a diſtinguiſhed member of the Gironde, inſtantly roſe and moved that the armed force ſhould be entruſted to the executive power. Robeſpierre precipitated himſelf inſtantly from his ſeat, and aſcended the tribune, demanding liberty to ſpeak to the ſafety and liberty of the people, and the rights of man. A violent debate took place, which only more confirmed the jealouſy of the parties, and the evils of the firſt imprudence; the executive council ſaw its weakneſs, and the members ſaw their individual danger, and they propoſed that the executive council ſhould be aboliſhed, and the adminiſtration exerciſed by the convention by means of a committee; the majority of the convention at this period were neither ſwayed by terror, nor did the paſſions of party preclude the formation of great deſigns, and had this meaſure been then adopted it is probable that the proſcriptions which ſoon followed would never have taken place; for the ſubſequent diſtractions did not proceed from the exerciſe of a boundleſs power by the majority, but from their not having aſſumed the power; as it was ſoon after uſurped by the minority, who exerciſed it firſt by the intervention of the commune, afterwards directly by themſelves, and at laſt by a few committees, who exerciſed univerſal oppreſſion, without aſſuming even the appellation of committees of government.

The mutual threats of both ſides, different in nature but equally violent, became every day more terrible and alarming. They were as two armies encamped over againſt each other, impatient to combat, and watching for the favourable occaſion, to ſtrike a deciſive blow. The diſtractions occaſioned by the diſturbances which took place on the tenth of March precipitated the career of events.

The news of the defection of Dumourier, which were received on the ſame day, made gloomy and unfavourable impreſſions upon the public imagination. From one act of treachery, occaſion was taken to excite ſuſpicions of a thouſand others, and to infer the probability of all in the truth of one. Dumourier's former intimacy with Briſſot and the deputies of the Gironde, had been long ſince ſucceeded by a reſentment which they could ſcarcely retain within the limits of that reſpect which was due from the general of the army, to the legiſlators of the commonwealth, and of that decent treatment which the legiſlators owed to a general by whoſe ſervices the Republic was triumphant. But, their enemies pretended to believe them ſtill united, in order that they might thence have a pretext to deſtroy them together, to join them in the ſame proſcription. That indignation which Dumourier deſerved by his conduct in Belgium, was at Paris turned againſt Briſſot and the deputies of the Gironde.

The effect was not leſs powerful on the public mind: the intimacy of Dumourier with Briſſot and thoſe enlightened literati who compoſed his party; but who only tolerated the general and man of letters, while they abhorred his private vices and his notorious duplicity of character, incurred the reſentment of the irritated people, and converted all that reſpect which their patriotiſm and talents had inſpired into an hatred that was the more inveterate from the very cauſe of their former attachment. The Mountain were not inactive; the intrepidity of the generality of thoſe men of whom it was compoſed, and above all that additional vigour with which a jealouſy of each other inſpired them, from a fear that they ſhould be ſurpaſſed in ardor, or ſuſpected from the moderate meaſures to be taken for the overthrow of their opponents, drove them to the moſt extravagant lengths. The Journal of Marat was now the popular oracle; the Jacobin club was the focus of ſedition, and the moſt abandoned of the idle and ignorant made it their rendezvous and their temple. Men of the moſt debauched characters now ſuperceded thoſe of talents and morality; and the name and attributes of liberty and virtue appeared to ſuffer a debaſement from the extravagancies committed in their name. The tranſactions which followed it would be abſurd to attribute to any fixed plan; ſo contradictory and variable do they appear. Beſide the diviſions which we have noticed and that ſtimulus of jealouſy which ſubſiſted between the factions, whoſe force was centred in the mountain; the courſe of time has brought to light many ſecret operations of the combined powers and of the emigrants to fan the flame of diſorder, with the hope of re-eſtabliſhing the ancient deſpotiſm upon the ruins of anarchy. The clubs were the conſtant ſcenes of theſe intrigues, and foreign gold and royal attachment contributed to encreaſe the numbers and the fury of the furious.

Suſpicions only have reached the character of Marat, the tenor of his private life, neither countenances nor diſcourages the opinion that he was ſold to the enemies of France; but the ſuſpicion is not warranted by any other evidence than the ſanguinary ferocity of his character and the concurrence of a great number of the meaſures of the enemy with his tranſactions. Hebert, a character reſembling Marat in the enormity of his deſigns, and denunciations, greatly influenced the misfortunes of this period, by the publication of a Journal, under the title of Pere Ducheſne, in which looſe vulgarity and tawdry humour were by a ſingular union of extravagance and wickedneſs employed to corrupt the popular judgment, to debaſe the feelings and ſport with crimes and death. This monſter has been likewiſe conſidered as ſecretly ſold to the enemy, together with a number of others who had acquired power in the ſections of Paris through their daring conduct. The alarm of the ninth and tenth of March, was produced by theſe incendiaries; and it had been propoſed by Ronfin in the Jacobin club that all the members preſent on that night ſhould divide themſelves into two troops, one of which ſhould inſtantly maſſacre the obnoxious repreſentatives in the convention, which was alſo ſitting, and the other clear the houſe of all the miniſters. The propoſition was received with applauſe, ſabres were brandiſhed in the air;—a member had the courage to propoſe the impriſonment of the obnoxious characters, and their ſubſequent trial; and this amendment was put when Dubois Crance entered the hall, and with a noble daring expoſed the wickedneſs of the original motion and the danger of the amendment however humane and wiſely intended. He expoſed the inconſiſtency of ſuch proceedings with the principles of liberty, and by appealing to their juſtice gained a victory over the aſſaſſins, by the total rejection of both propoſitions, and was even applauded for his courage and happy interference. Still many of the deſparate had gone away in rage, and it was feared that they would perpetrate ſome horrid crimes. A ſimilar commotion had taken place at the Cordeliers club, but Danton had managed the popular impulſe in ſuch a manner, as to produce only a reſolution for a deputation to the mayor, demanding that the barriers ſhould be ſhut; the requeſt was of courſe denied and the ſtorm paſſed over, although the agitation continued in ſome meaſure for ſeveral days.

The intrigues of the foreign powers in the provinces of France, had produced convulſions as terrible in their conſequences as alarming to the government; their occurrence at the very period of Dnmourier's defection evidently ſanctioned the ſuppoſition that they were the effect of a common concert, which by one tremendous and general exploſion ſhould overthrow the republic. In the departments of Vendee and Loire, conſiderable numbers of the emigrants had collected, in oppoſition to ſeveral decrees during the winter of 1792, numbers of them had been thrown aſhore by Engliſh veſſels, and they were furniſhed with conſtant ſupplies from England of money, military ſtores, arms, and forged aſſignats;* theſe counter-revolutionary hirelings and traitors wore as a contradiſtinction from the republicans, a white cap, and their rallying words were 'Vive la Roi' and 'Vivent les Anglois!' They profeſſed to act by the authority of Monſieur, who had aſſumed the title of regent of France, and had gained ſeveral victories over the national-guards called out to oppoſe them. In one action after a ſevere conflict they took the city of Chantenay, and delivered it up to plunder; on the twenty-third of March the convention learned that they had made themſelves maſters of Cholet, Montaigne, and Cliſſon; they defeated general Marce who had been ſent to quell them; and Nantz was at the ſame time beſieged by another body of forty thouſand. In the beginning of April general Berruyere was appointed to the command of a force ſent againſt them, notwithſtanding before the end of that month they had poſſeſſed themſelves of a country fifty leagues in extent, and in two pitched battles defeated the republicans, and took immenſe ſtores, artillery, ammunition, and priſoners.

On the fourteenth of March, Laſource announced to the convention a diſcovery of that conſpiracy againſt France, of which he ſaid only a corner of the veil had been lifted by the treachery and diſappointment of Dumourier. It was diſcovered that the late king's brothers, the duke of Brunſwick, the Engliſh miniſters Pitt, Grenville, and Wyndham, in conjunction with Calonne, and ſeveral of the ex-dignified clergy, had combined to ſpread deſolation through the republic. That a committee of agents of the royal conſpirators was organized on the frontiers, who acted by ſecondary agents on every point, and in ſeveral departments; that inſurrection, aſſaſſination, and corruption, were not their only means, but they had beſides the diſtribution of forged aſſignats and arms, and contrived means to export numerous ſums of the current ſpecie. That 'twenty-eight' of thoſe agents had been diſcovered and ſeized by order of the executive, at Rennes, Lumballe, St. Malo, and in Paris. The thread of the conſpiracy had been in the hands of the executive for two months, but its rammifications were ſo extenſive and complex, that it could not be eſtabliſhed and the traitors detected before. Among the papers ſeized were thirty-eight commiſſions delivered by the two Capets to thoſe agents.

* The aſſignats were forged under the agency of the Engliſh miniſtry; the braſs cuts were executed by an engraver in Holborn London, the Alert, a faſt ſailing veſſel formerly a privateer belonging to Maſſachuſſetts, was the principal conveyance by which they were ſent to France; the veſſel uſually ſailed from Teignmouth, or one of the other ports in Torbay, and returned with intelligence to an agent ſtationed for the purpoſe at the weſtern ports of England. This veſſel, about the cloſe of the year 1794, was chaſed by a French frigate from the coaſt of France into Torbay, where ſhe was run on ſhore near the mouth of the river Ex.

Intelligence from every quarter corroborated the multiplied variety and extent of this combination; the Spaniards about the period between the end of April and the middle of March had overrun the country of Rouſillon, where they had been joined by a large body of the malcontents, and defeated the republicans in ſeveral encounters. From Mont Blanc advice was received of a violent fermentation, and that the king of Sardinia was raiſing a numerous force to ſecond the agitation which had been created by the fanatical clergy and the ex-nobles, and that a number of the emigrants with arms and money had already entered that department and threatened the utmoſt dangers.

The elder brother of the late king, had aſſumed the title of regent immediately after the death of the monarch; and publiſhed a proclamation wherein he declared Louis Charles (ſon of the late king) ſovereign of France, under the title of Louis the ſeventeenth; himſelf as regent, and his brother (Artois) lieutenant of France; this public paper was drawn up by Calonne, and declared a determination to re-eſtabliſh the French monarch, the religion of their forefathers according to the canons of the church, and the regular adminiſtrations of former times; this paper was dated, "at Ham in "Weſtphalia, on the twenty-eighth of January 1793, under the ſeal, which we uſe in "ſigning ſovereign acts till the ſeals deſtroyed by the reigning faction are remade;" and was counter-ſigned by the mareſchals Broglio and de Caſtries, appointed his miniſters of ſtate.

It was under this authority that commiſſions were iſſued to the agents of inſurrection; and great numbers of them had been ſent to England and different parts of France with blanks to be filled up as occaſion might require. How far theſe meaſures of the late princes were inſtrumental to the ſubſequent fate of the royal family, it is not difficult to perceive. That they were not founded in wiſdom, nor in prudence, their conſtruction, their violence, and the objects contemplated to be obtained are too obvious at this period: they were calculated in fact to divide from the adherents of monarchy all thoſe who from principle or for conſiſtency were bound to pay ſome reſpect to the union of repreſentative with monarchical government.

But misfortune was not confined to thoſe alarming occurrences; an expedition againſt Cagliari, the capital ſeaport of Sardinia, was equally diſaſtrous. Admiral Truguet ſailed from Toulon with a ſmall ſquadron of line of battle ſhips and frigates, and anchored before that town on the twenty-fourth of January, and immediately commenced a furious cannonade; but his tranſports with a conſiderable body of troops on board, had not yet arrived, and he abated his fire and ceaſed wholly on the twenty-ninth. A conſiderable body of volunteers who had embarked on board the ſhips of war, grew impatient at the delay, and notwithſtanding every argument uſed by the admiral to ſhew the danger of landing with ſuch a ſmall force, without the co-operation of the greater body hourly expected, they were not to be diſſuaded from the enterpriſe; accordingly on the thirteenth of February, four ſhips and two bomb-ketches were anchored cloſe under the town, and a ſimilar force between the town and an elevated ground that was ſtrongly fortified; a ſingle ſhip was anchored in a poſition cloſe upon another quarter of the town with a view to batter it, while three ſhips and three frigates covered the landing of the troops. Of all theſe ſhips the Themiſtocles alone did execution, but ſhe received a red-hot ſhot which ſet her on fire; her captain was mortally wounded, and ſhe was obliged to retire in the night to extinguiſh the fire. The Patriot had fired ſo inceſſantly for three days that her ammunition was exhauſted, and had with the Juno frigate ſeveral men killed and wounded.

The deſcent was effected under the command of general Caſa-Bianca, with fifteen hundred troops of the line, and three thouſand national volunteers; another deſcent was to be made at ſome diſtance, and a certain ſignal was agreed upon. The ſame ſignal was obſerved in the iſland, and the troops heard the following words pronounced through a ſpeaking-trumpet:—'Citizens, come on ſhore; we have put the enemy to flight.' The troops, however, ſuſpected the deluſion, eſpecially as they could obſerve with their glaſſes that the invitation came from perſons in the Sardinian uniform. The ſecond deſcent therefore was countermanded. Caſa-Bianca, however, formed a camp at the diſtance of half a league from the town, with fifteen pieces of cannon and ſome mortars; but the troops were ſeized with an inſtantaneous panic, they miſtook the word of command, and the patroles fired upon each other; the ſoldiers imagined themſelves too weak in number, and requeſted to be re-embarked, and ſome of them without orders began to retire towards the beach. In this diſagreeable ſituation the general was compelled to re-embark his troops, and it was with great difficulty he was able to ſave his cannon. When the troops returned on board, Truguet immediately ſet ſail. The Leopard, a ſhip of the line, ran on ſhore, but the crew were ſaved. A tartan, which ran on ſhore alſo, was burned by the Sardinians.

Among ſuch multiplied dangers, diſaſters, and aſſaults, combined with ſo much induſtry, ſupported by powers ſo immenſe and enemies ſo inveterate; poſſeſſing the cooperative force of religious fanaticiſm in the the greater part of France, and political fanaticiſm and factious conflict in not only the capital, but in the very centre of the national authority; that France ſhould be yet able to reſiſt them all, appears aſtoniſhing but more ſo that ſhe ſhould triumph over them.

The popular diſquietudes of March had been more formidable in their deſign than in their execution. But they had rendered meaſures of vigour indiſpenſable. In the midſt of theſe troubles Gaudet had propoſed the removal of the convention to Verſailles; which was not agreed to; but the preſſure provoked the formation of a new tribunal, which was to judge all crimes of conſpiracy and counter-revolution without appeal, and thence was called the revolutionary tribunal. This meaſure which was the project of Danton, and expreſsly deſigned to bury under a general meaſure of energy and ſafety, all the fears of one party, and the dangerous uſurpations of another, unhappily produced the moſt oppoſite effects. The executive council, which ſtill principally conſiſted of Girondiſts, were ſolicitous to be delivered from their irkſome ſituation; but the danger of retreat was as great as that of continuance in authority. The mountain had now gained under Robeſpiere ſo alarming an aſcendancy over the populace through the irritation of public diſtreſs, that many of the members that compoſed the mountain became as much alarmed for their individual ſafety as thoſe of the Gironde, and this tribuual was expected to be a ſufficient control againſt tyranny, as well as a powerful check on private conſpiracy.

The convention alſo took the moſt vigorous meaſures for the military and naval equipments; at once to enable the government to obtain the completeſt knowledge of the number of males in every diſtrict, either of an age for military ſervice, or ſuch as might be concealed for treaſonable purpoſes, every proprietor and occupant of a houſe was obliged to place on the outside of it in legible characters, the name, age, and profession of every individual habitually resident therein; and to keep the list constantly renewed, upon any occasion of change. The army was at the same time ordered to be augmented to four hundred and twenty-seven thousand men, although in the month of January there was not money enough in the treasury to pay the military establishment up to April.

It was in the period when Dumourier was conspiring with the enemy, that the constitution, was presented, on the fifteenth of February, to the convention by Condorcet, to whom its formation has been generally attributed; the features by which it was distinguished from that which preceded it, consisted in the abolition of royalty, and of electoral assemblies; the members of the legislature were to be appointed immediately by the people in primary assemblies: the executive council or ministers were to be elected by the people and to be dismissed only by the verdict of a special jury; to prevent frequent elections supplementary candidates were to be chosen for each department of office; and the interior administration was to be newly arranged. This constitution however, was never decreed, and in the month of June was supplanted by another.

On the seventh of March, it was that the conduct of Spain on the frontiers, her naval equipments, and her concert with the combined powers, provoked France to declare war against that nation, by a decree which ordered the augmentation of the army of the Pyrennees to one hundred thousand men. On the twenty-third of the same month, the court of Spain issued a counter declaration of war against France.

The highest expectations had been indulged from the plans formed by the combined powers, and their first success in the shock given to the French armies. Distrust it was expected would have succeeded the desertion of the general, and that the want of confidence would have peryaded every department of the government and the army. These vain hopes were not destroyed even by the admirable constancy and virtue of the French troops, and their dereliction of their favourite general, their leader in victory, for the more sacred obligation of their country and liberty. That any of the powers should expect success after such magnanimity, is one of those evidences of extraordinary infatuation which have marked the conduct and aggressions of the war.

The proclamations of Cobourg and Dumourier, which were calculated at least to colour the designs of the coalesced powers, with an appearance of moderation, proved highly alarming to the several members of the confederacy. On the eighth of April, a congress of their representatives was held at Antwerp, consisting of the Stadtholder and his two sons, the grand Pensionary Van Speigel, on the part of Holland; the duke of York and lord Aukland, for England; Kuller and Knobelsdorf, for Prussia; prince Cobourg, Metternich and his two sons, and counts Starhemberg and Merci-d'Argenteau, for the German powers; and the ministers of Spain and Sicily. The professed object of this assembly rapidly summoned together, was to settle a plan for the prosecution of the war, particularly the manner of invading France.

It has been remarked in the spirit of despairing lamentation, by one of the most zealous promoters of hostility and insurrection, and one to whom a large portion of the miseries that have afflicted Europe are to be attributed,* that the only aim of the coalesced powers was to conquer, when it was evident that victory would not necessarily produce subjugation; that their only effort was directed to military operations, on which they could not agree any more than in their political views; there was neither union in their projects, uniformity in their ideas, nor a general direction to the ſame point of action. It was a general opinion with them, before the firſt campaign, that terror alone could operate on the French nation, becauſe they conceived the revolution to have been produced by terror. A bold and rapid movement for Paris therefore was thought not only to be the moſt certain but a practicable plan for the accompliſhment of this end. But after having ſurmounted the firſt difficulties, after having penetrated beyond the firſt lines of the frontier towns, when their army, commanded by one of the firſt generals of Europe, was but forty-five leagues from Paris, when panic had already ſeized the capital; all at once, as if by a fatality, all their exulting hopes were blaſted, and a retrograde movement became neceſſary to the projector of the mighty deſign; the veterans of Pruſſia and the pupil of its great warrior, were ſeen flying before an inferior force of raw and ragged Frenchmen, half fed, unſhod, and led by a general who had never commanded an army before that campaign.

* Calonne.

The opening of the ſecond ſo far as it had proceeded was to all appearance favourable to the views of the allies. The congreſs at Antwerp had conſidered the fatality of their progreſs in Champaign in 1792; and as if the eaſe with which they had paſſed into the country had been too great to be glorious, after having by the treachery of Dumourier become poſſeſſed of all the Netherlands, with the ſame rapidity that he had previouſly conquered them, they reſolved to attack the frontier of France, covered with ſo many impregnable fortreſſes, that it has been called the iron frontier.

The iſſue of this plan will be ſeen; inſtead of marching directly to Paris, it was now determined to beſiege at once as many of the ſtrong places as poſſible; by this means all the republican troops were expected to be called to the frontier, and the royaliſts in the interior be thus left without oppoſition. The ſtrong places as they were to fall, it was determined ſhould be garriſoned by the combined powers, and ſerve as points of action and co-operation, as occaſion might require. The navies of England, Holland, and Spain were to act in concert, and form a chain of cruiſers round the coaſt, all trade was to be ſhut out, the nation to be blocked up, and ſuccour to be afforded to the royaliſts wherever they ſhould appear. Thus attacked and hemmed in, while the moſt vigorous ſupport and encouragement was to be given to the cooperators of inſurrection in the interior, it was not queſtioned but the republicans muſt be compelled to a ſpeedy and unconditional ſubmiſſion.

But a principal object of conſideration at the meeting of the congreſs on the eighth of April, was the proclamation publiſhed by the prince of Cobourg, in conjunction with Dumourier. The conduct of the prince of Cobourg was treated with much ſeverity and indecorum; prince Hohenloe had publicly teſtified his diſapprobation of the proclamation, and had treated Dumourier and the other deſerters with the utmoſt diſreſpect, and even forbad their admiſſion to his quarters. At the meeting of the congreſs, he was aſked by the Pruſſian miniſter if he had received orders from the emperor for ſuch a publication as he had made, and on replying in the negative, was informed that if he did not retract it, another would be publiſhed in the name of the king of Pruſſia of a different tenor. Lord Auckland warmly teſtified his concurrence with the miniſter of Pruſſia. Count Metternich, ſaid he had under the emperor's own hand opinions of the moſt oppoſite tendency to thoſe contained in the proclamation. And the duke of York obſerved that much cenſure had been indiſcreetly thrown out on his father-in-law (the king of Pruſſia) and the duke of Brunſwick, but that they had never iſſued ſuch a proclamation as that of the prince.

The plan of the war now agreed upon neceſſarily implied a diſregard of thoſe promiſes ſolemnly made by that general, and accordingly another proclamation was drawn up and publiſhed on the ninth, ſigned alſo by Cobourg, wherein he unſaid the whole of his previous engagements publiſhed on the fifth, and the ſcheme of conqueſt was formally announced to be renewed.

The French commiſſioners in the mean time, who had been ſent to the army, omitted no means of reſtoring order, and invigorating the ſpirit of their troops. The ſtandard of the republic was no ſooner ſet up, than the battalions which had diſperſed from the camp of Maulde reſorted to it; and general Dampierre, who had evinced his patriotiſm by his reſiſtance to the orders of Dumourier, was proviſionally appointed by the commiſſioners to the chief command. In leſs than a week general Dampierre had reſtored order and diſcipline to their diſorganiſed troops, and was enabled to lead them to action, and to frequent victory.

On the thirteenth of April, the advanced poſts of the French army, under that general were attacked in ſix different points, but the aſſailants were repulſed with conſiderable loſs. General Dampierre at the ſame time was enabled to reſume the camp of Famars. On the fourteenth and fifteenth the advance guard was again aſſailed by the enemy: on the former of thoſe days, they were compelled by ſuperior numbers to give way, but on the ſucceeding day they were victorious. The firing continued from four in the morning till eight in the evening, with as much violence as at the battle of Neerwinden.

On the twenty-third the Auſtrians again attacked the French near Maubeuge, but after a conflict of ten hours were repulſed with conſiderable loſs; and on the firſt of May general Dampierre attempted to diſlodge the enemy from ſeveral villages of which they were in poſſeſſion, but in his turn experienced a repulſe. On this occaſion the Auſtrians had ſix hundred killed and two thouſand wounded, and the French had three hundred killed and ſix hundred wounded.

An action of a more ſerious nature took place on the eighth of May. General Dampierre on that day advanced to diſlodge the enemy, who were poſted in the wood of Rheme and Vicoigne; but the ardour of the general having prompted him to too great an expoſure of his perſon, his thigh was carried off by a cannon ball, and he expired the following day, leaving the command in the hands of general Lamarche. In this action the Auſtrians loſt in killed and wounded five hundred men, and the Pruſſians three hundred: of the Engliſh troops, who were engaged and who ſuffered greatly, no official return was made. The loſs of the French was eſtimated at four thouſand.

From this period to the twenty-third little of importance occured. On that day it was determined by the allies to attempt to diſlodge the French from their fortified camp on the heights of Famars, which covered and protected the town of Valenciennes. At day-break the Britiſh and Hanoverians aſſembled under the command of the duke of York, and the Auſtrians and German auxiliaries under that of the prince of Cobourg and general Clairfait. A thick fog prevented for ſome time the advance of the troops; and they ſoon experienced a tremendous fire from the entrenchments of the French. The conteſt, an Engliſh officer ſtates, was of the ſevereſt kind, and in the field the French were defeated. The duke of York then advanced within a ſmall diſtance of the works; but obſerving from the diſpoſition of the French that they could not be carried without conſiderable loſs, he determined to defer the attack till day-break on the following day. In the courſe of the night, however, the French, apprehenſive of the conſequences, and probably much weakened by the action, abandoned their camp, and withdrew partly into Valenciennes, while another party retired to Denain, towards Bouchain and Cambray. No official return was made of the loſs of the allies; but on both ſides it muſt have been conſiderable.

The ſucceſs on the twenty-third enabled the allies to lay formal ſiege to Valenciennes. Conde had been inveſted from the beginning of April, and the communication entirely cut off between that place and Valenciennes. To re-eſtabliſh that communication was the object of general Dampierre on the eighth of May, when he received the fatal wound that deprived him of life.

While theſe affairs were tranſacting in the north, but little of importance occurred in other parts. In the beginning of May general Cuſtine, who commanded the army of the Rhine, formed a deſign of cutting off from the enemy a body of ſeven or eight thouſand men who had advanced as far as Rheinzabern; but, to ſucceed, it was neceſſary to amuſe the Pruſſians in all parts, and to deſtroy the effect of the cavalry and infantry which they had near Landau. Had he been to retain the command of this army, he ſaid he ſhould have deferred that enterpriſe until the commencement of June, and then the army, better exerciſed, would have been in a condition to execute it completely; but reflecting that he was about to depart and take upon him the command of the army of the North, he determined to attempt an action, to prevent the Pruſſians from taking advantage of their good poſition. He therefore ſent orders to general Houchard to attack in the rear Limberg and Carlberg with the army of the Moſelle, while Pulli ſhould keep in check, and attack with the reſt of the corps des Voſges, a Pruſſian corps who had advanced, and while general Sulek, with nine battalions and ſome cavalry, ſhould advance towards Anweiler to moleſt the enemy. The ſame day the garriſon of Landau had orders to occupy the banks of the canal of Anweiler, the vineyards and the village of Nuſderff, with ſeveral other poſts, and to give the Pruſſians reaſon to apprehend that they would be attacked in the rear, in caſe they ſhould attempt any movements. He alſo cauſed a report to be ſpread in the Pruſſian army, that the cavalry of the Moſelle had arrived, as well as part of the artillery of Straſbourg. In the mean time general Ferrier, who commanded forty battalions, was ordered only to ſhew himſelf to the enemy till he ſhould hear that the engagement had commenced, and to attack them in the wood of Rheinzabern, and the Auſtrians who were in it beyond the village. Notwithſtanding theſe orders, Cuſtine obſerves, that he did not ſee his troops appear till eleven o'clock, at which time general Drietmann had commanded a retreat, becauſe the troops were fatigued and could procure neither proviſions nor drink. The general himſelf began to march at eight o'clock in the evening, with twenty ſix battalions and eight regiments, to the heights near Inſheim; but ſeveral unavoidable delays prevented him from arriving at that place till five in the morning. The advance guard, under the command of general Landremont, kept the enemy in check, and prevented them from quitting the foreſt of Germerſheim. While general Landremont was thus engaging the Auſtrian army, and preventing them from advancing, the main army extended to the heights of Rulſheim, and proceeded as far as that village. Cuſtine charged two diviſions of dragoons with vigour, who fled after ſuſtaining conſiderable loſs. Among the number of the dead were three officers. The general obſerved, that had it not been for the infatuation of a battalion, who miſtook the French cavalry for that of the enemy, this day would have been glorious for the troops of the republic; they anſwered all attempts to rally them, only by diſcharges of muſquetry and it was with great difficulty they could be prevailed upon to reſume their ranks. The general was informed that this event was occaſioned by the commander, who began the cry of treachery. He was arreſted, and deſtroyed himſelf. "This day, which ought to have been ſo memorable," added Cuſtine, "terminated by the taking of "one piece of cannon, and a very great number of priſoners." The Pruſſians were ſoon after enabled to form the ſiege of Mentz.

At this fatal period, the machinations of the combined powers had obtained a more commanding influence than at any period before or ſince, in the internal affairs of France; their emiſſaries were ſpread over every one of the departments; eighteen millions ſterling had been expended on this ſervice by one power alone, excluſive of fleets and armies; and conſpiracy and treachery ſeem to have pervaded every part of the French territory. On the ſecond of April the popular ſociety of Toulon denounced the Corſican general Paoli as a traitor, and his ſubſequent conduct has proved that the accuſation was too well founded. Paoli was cited to appear at the bar of the convention, but excuſed himſelf; and the perſons who were ſent to arreſt him declared that the ſervice was too dangerous to be attempted.

At the ſame time charges of a ſerious nature were exhibited againſt the ex-miniſter Bournonville, who was accuſed as an accomplice of Dumourier.

The pauſe which at this time took place in the military tranſactions, affords an opportunity to review the no leſs important proceedings of the convention. In the month of March the celebrated revolutionary tribunal, for judging offences againſt the ſtate, was completely organized.—The plan on which this tribunal was formed is as follows:

I. The revolutionary tribunal ſhall take cognizance of every enterpriſe, plot, and attempt againſt the liberty and ſovereignty of the people, and the unity, indiviſibility, and external as well as internal ſafety of the republic; of every plan tending to eſtabliſh royalty, and of every crime relating to the fabrication of forged aſſignats.

II. The tribunal ſhall conſiſt of ſix judges, divided into two ſections. Three members in each ſection ſhall be ſufficient to examine facts denounced.

III. The judges ſhall be choſen by the national convention, by the open vote and by a relative majority.

IV. To this tribunal ſhall belong a public accuſer and two aſſiſtants, named by the convention in the ſame manner as the judges. A commiſſion of ſix members ſhall alſo be appointed to draw up the decrees of accuſation which may be paſſed by the convention.

V. The jurors ſhall be in number twelve, and their ſubſtitutes three. They ſhall be taken from the department of Paris, until the firſt of May next; an epoch when the electoral bodies muſt renew their jurors.

VI. Crimes againſt general ſafety, aſſigned heretofore to the cognizance of municipalities, ſhall in future be judged by the revolutionary tribunals.

BARERE.

VII. There ſhall be no appeal from the ſentence.

VIII. Sentences paſſed in the abſence of the accuſed, ſhall have the ſame effect as if they were preſent.

IX. Perſons accuſed who ſhall not appear within three months, ſhall be conſidered as emigrants, and treated as ſuch.

As the intentions of the parties which divided the convention had been groſsly miſrepreſented, and as ſome of the indigent and deſparate of the citizens had underſtood the term equality, which was adopted in the declaration of rights, as referring not to an equality of rights, but an equality of property; about the ſame period a decree was propoſed on the motion of Barrere, and adopted by the convention, denouncing the puniſhment of death againſt any perſon who ſhould propoſe an agrarian law, or who ſhould attempt to injure territorial, commercial, or perſonal property.

Another decree, which was paſſed on the twenty-ninth of the ſame month declared, that all perſons convicted of compoſing or printing writings for the reſtoration of monarchy in France, or the diſſolution of the national repreſentation, ſhould be puniſhed with death. All perſons guilty of attempting a counter-revolution were at the ſame time declared outlaws; and on the firſt of April a decree was paſſed aboliſhing the inviolability of the deputies of the convention, when accuſed of crimes againſt the ſtate.

In every revolution there will be found neceſſary an executive authority, with powers ſufficiently ſtrong to prevent frequent inſurrection and conſpiracy, and ſufficiently compact to be able to execute its deſigns with ſecrecy and prompitude. It was evidently among the defects of the firſt conſtitution of France, that no ſuch power exiſted; and ſince the revolution of the tenth of Auguſt, the powers granted to the ordinary miniſters, who formed what was called the executive council, were not adequate to theſe ends. On the ſeventh of April, therefore, a committee of public ſafety, with enlarged powers, was inſtituted by the convention; but as the authority delegated to the members of this committee was extenſive, it was judged prudent to limit its duration to a ſingle month. After much debate upon the ſubject, the committee was organiſed agreeably to the terms of the following decree:—

Art. I. A committee of public ſafety, conſiſting of nine members, taken from the convention, ſhall be formed by open vote.

II. This committee ſhall deliberate in ſecret, and ſhall be charged to watch over and accelerate the actions of the adminiſtration entruſted to the executive council, whoſe decrees it may ſuſpend, when it thinks them contrary to the public intereſt, being bound at the ſame time to give information to the convention.

III. It is authoriſed to purſue, in urgent circumſtances, external and internal meaſures of general defence; and its decrees, ſigned by the majority of its deliberating members, which ſhall never be leſs than two thirds, ſhall be executed by the proviſional executive council; and it cannot in any caſe iſſue mandates of arreſt but againſt executive agents, bound at the ſame time to give immediate information to the convention.

IV. The particular agents whom the committee may think proper to employ ſhall be paid from the public treaſury.

V. The national treaſury ſhall, for this purpoſe, keep ready, at the diſpoſal of the committee, the ſum of one hundred thouſand livres,

VI. It may divide itſelf into ſections to exerciſe its operations with ſafety.

VII. It ſhall make a general report of its operations, and of the ſituation of the republic.

VIII. It ſhall keep a journal of its deliberations, which ſhall be ſigned by all the members preſent.

IX. This committee ſhall be eſtabliſhed only for one month.

The firſt members of this committee were Barrere, Delmas, Breard, Cambon, Jean de Brie, Danton, Guiton-Morveau, Treilhard, and Lacroix.

The defection of Dumourier, which ſeemed to have been concerted with certain branches of the Bourbon family, contributed at this period to overwhelm the whole of this unhappy race in diſgrace and misfortune. A propoſal had been made, it is ſaid, to the combined powers to exchange the queen and the other priſoners in the Temple, for the commiſſioners who had been arreſted by Dumourier; and this tranſaction was to ſerve as a baſis for the treaty of peace. On what ground this humane propoſal was fruſtrated we are not informed; but we cannot help thinking that, if the allies had in an open and manly manner proceeded to treat upon theſe terms, much miſery and bloodſhed might have been prevented. As, however, both parties appeared unwilling to agree to the terms propoſed by each other, it was decreed by the convention, on the ſeventh of April, that all the members of the Bourbon family, as well as all Auſtrian officers, and other members of the Germanic body who had been taken priſoners, ſhould be detained as hoſtages for the ſafety of the arreſted deputies; and that all the Bourbons ſhould be removed to Marſeilles, except ſuch as were previouſly confined in the Temple: the ci-devant duke of Orleans, notwithſtanding his quality as a deputy of the convention, was included in this decree.

On the ninth of the ſame month a decree was alſo paſſed, enjoining that all bargains and contracts ſhould be paid in aſſignats, and not in ſpecie. The reaſon urged in favour of this arrangement was the great depreciation which the paper currency of France had ſuffered. About the ſame time the powers of the commiſſioners ſent to the armies were enlarged.

A conſiderable part of the month of April was ſpent in diſcuſſing and digeſting the declaration of rights, which was to ſerve as a preface to the new conſtitution. It was propoſed by Salles and ſome other members, to confine themſelves to the declaration which had been enacted in 1789, by the conſtituent aſſembly; but the majority appeared to incline to a new declaration. On the tenth of May the convention took poſſeſſion of their new hall in the Thuilleries, and on that day decreed the firſt article of the new conſtitution; viz. "The French Republic is one and indiviſible."

In the mean time the diviſions which had ſo long ſubſiſted between the two great parties in the convention, proceeded rapidly to an open and violent rupture. The party of Robeſpierre and Marat had imperceptibly gained on the affections and prejudices of the populace of Paris; and the Jacobin club became gradually under their entire direction. The deſire manifeſted by ſome of the Briſſotines or Gironde faction to ſave the life of the king, had not contributed to their popularity; and the multitude, inſtead of attributing it to motives of humanity and juſtice, were eaſily perſuaded that their principles had been corrupted by bribes from thoſe powers whom they ſuppoſed intereſted in the prevention of that cataſtrophe.

The treachery of Dumourier, and the intimate union which had always ſubſiſted between that general and the houſe of Orleans; and ſeveral of the Briſſotines, as well as Briſſot himſelf, rendered them objects of ſuſpicion.

The unpopular manners of Roland, who was ſtill a man of integrity, and the vanity of others of that party; their being in poſſeſſion of power, and the inordinate love of it which they manifeſted, excited the diſtruſt and jealouſy of many. We may add to theſe cauſes for the decline of their influence, the manifeſt incapacity which they, and the miniſters appointed by them, had betrayed in the conduct of public affairs; the neglect of the army, and their tardineſs in preſenting the nation with a conſtitution.

It is a melancholy conſideration, that to the lenity of their government may be juſtly aſcribed the immediate ruin of the Gironde party. Had they in an early ſtage of the conteſt puniſhed with ſeverity their opponents and caluminators, they might certainly have retained their power longer. It is to their honour indeed that they did not chooſe to ſecure their power by a violation of juſtice and humanity. Such a conduct is calculated to cover a multitude of errors; and it is more noble to fall in ſuch a manner, than to be victorious by cruelty and violence.

In the latter ſtages of the conteſt, they did not, it muſt be confeſſed, proceed with the ſame moderation. The oppoſition was then reduced to a ſecret and inſiduous conteſt; and though it is probable, that in the firſt inſtance the diſpute was no other than a party ſtruggle for the power and emoluments of the ſtate, and that their adverſaries themſelves did not think of attacking their lives, and wanted only their places; yet the quarrel grew by degrees to ſo great an extent, that the life of every individual of each party was ſtaked upon the iſſue.

So ſtrong was the impreſſion, which the report of the Gironde party being confederates with Dumourier had made upon the people, that ſo early as the ninth of April a petition was received from one of the ſections of Paris, accuſing Guadet, Vergniaud, Genſonne, and ſome other of the deputies, as accomplices of that perfidious officer, and requeſting that they might be puniſhed.

On the fifteenth of April a petition was preſented by the communes of the forty-eight ſections of Paris, demanding that Briſſot, Gaudet, Vergniaud, Genſonne, Grangeneuve, Barbaroux, Buzot, Salles, Biroteau, Petion, Lanjuinais, Fauchet, Valazé, Laſource, Pontecoulant, Lehardy, Gorſas, Valady, Chambon, Hardy, Lanthenas, and Louvet, ſhould be impeached and expelled the convention. This diſcuſſion was for the time obſtructed by intelligence being preſented of a diſaſtrous nature from Valenciennes. On the next day the convention paſſed the following addreſs—

"The national convention of France, to all people and all governments: It is not only to a people who pronounce the name of liberty—it is not only to a man whoſe reaſon is not miſguided by fanaticiſm, whoſe ſoul is unſtained by ſervitude—it is to all people, to all men, that the French republic denounces the violation of the right of nations committed by the French generals. A Frenchman, a perjurer, abuſing the power given him by the national convention, againſt the national convention itſelf, has areſted four of its members. It is not a citizen who diſregards the character of a repreſentative of the people in a private enemy, in a man of an oppoſite party it is a general who violates that ſacred character which he was bound to defend. Too well aſſured that the repreſentatives of the French would ſoon reſtore by their preſence the whole army of the republic, Dumourier has baſely delivered them to our enemies, in hopes that he might be protected, and enjoy undiſturbed the gold acquired by his crimes; and the Auſtrian generals have not bluſhed at becoming his accomplices and partakers of his ſhame, as well as of his criminal deeds. In a civilized nation did ever the right of war authoriſe us to detain as priſoners, much leſs as hoſtages, thoſe men whom an infamous treaſon had betrayed? It is not on the Auſtrian dominions, it is on the French territory they have been ſtopped. A crime, and not a military artifice, or a victory, has put them into the hands of Cobourg. To think they may be legally detained, would be to juſtify thoſe who have baſely delivered them up; or to allow that a general has a right to ſell the magiſtrates, miniſters, repreſentatives of his country, to his inveterate enemies—Will our enemies ſay they do not acknowlege the French republic? Let them deny the exiſtence of the French territory. Let them deny the exiſtence of a territory where twenty-eight millions of men have proclaimed republican liberty. They refuſe to acknowlege the republic, and they acknowlege Dumourier. To whom was the truce offered but the troops of the republic? Would it have been accepted by them, if it had been conſidered as the price of that treaſon they deteſt? And when our enemies break the truce—at a time when the plots of Dumourier are diſcovered, have they not avowed that they meant to deceive the army? Have they not announced that they would treat only with traitors? Freemen of all countries riſe againſt the baſe and perfidious conduct of the generals of Auſtria, or elſe you will ſoon have no other laws but thoſe of ſavages. What will become of your rights, if to deprive you of their moſt zealous defenders, it is enough to find a traitor that will ſell them, and a deſpot who dares to buy them.

"Kings! remember, that a conſpirator may alſo deliver you to your enemies, and tremble leſt you ſhould become victims of the example Cobourg has given! The greater the influence, the greater your authority, the more religiouſly you ought to reſpect the ſolemn ties that unite men. Your agents, your heralds, even in the camps of your enemies, are ſecured only by the impreſſion of the character with which you have veſted them. Your wars (thoſe wars which, from your palaces, are but too often directed merely to gratify your barbarous love of victory) are carried on through the laws of nations. Take care—the crime committed on the repreſentatives of a great nation, is an outrage of the firſt of laws; it annihilates the traditional reſpect agreed upon by all civilized nations, and exhibits to the hardened mind, the cruel right reſerved to barbarous hordes—the right of purſuiug one's enemy like a ſavage beaſt. The veil is torn that was thrown over our enemies. Brunſwick declared that he came only to aboliſh a conſtitution, where the regal authority was reviled; to-day he comes to re-eſtabliſh that very conſtitution, becauſe the name of a king is not preſerved. People, do you underſtand that language? It is not to gratify pride and tyranny—it is againſt the independence of nations, that war is now waged againſt the republic.

"They have the effrontery to ſay to republicans, that they will not ſuffer a great nation to exiſt without a king. They know that the exiſtence of a republic in France will be an everlaſting obſtacle to the plan they have formed of giving a maſter to every nation. To even you, who are governed by kings, we make the appeal!---Have not the French a right to eſtabliſh a free conſtitution, upon the baſis of the ſacred rights of man? The French nation ſpeaks to the kingdoms of the earth, however governed (they have all a right to be governed as they think proper) and puts under the ſafeguard of their generoſity the moſt ſacred rights—Their repreſentatives ſold by treaſon to tyranny."

On the firſt of May a petition was preſented by a deputation from the fauxbourg of St. Antoine; the preſident of which, after propoſing a plan for the recruiting of the armies, addreſſed the convention in theſe words:—"We come," ſaid he, "legiſlators, to tell you ſevere truths—Employing yourſelves for a long time as you have with your perſonal intereſts and paſſions, declare to us what you have done! You have promiſed every thing, and kept your word in nothing. Our defenders have been left deſtitute of every neceſſary: you have engaged to regulate the price of proviſions; to relieve the neceſſitous; but in no one inſtance have you kept your word."—He concluded with declaring the fauxbourg in a ſtate of inſurrection, and deſiring that the deputation, to the number of eight thouſand, but unarmed, might be permitted to file through the hall. A warm debate enſued; but the inhabitants compoſed the tumult by aſſuring them that they wiſhed to defend, not to deſtroy the convention.

The Gironde party, on the other hand, was not inactive; and as much of the diſcontent among the people was ſuppoſed to be excited by the inflamatory journal of which Marat was the conductor, that deputy was denounced by Salles, as a ſeditious perſon, ſo early as the twenty-ſixth of February. As the convention however did not think it prudent to purſue him with rigour, ſupported as he was by ſo ſtrong a party, and by that formidable body the Jacobin club, he ſtill continued his attendance in the hall of the legiſlature; and on the firſt of April he recriminated on the Gironde, and in his place in the convention denounced three hundred of the deputies, at the head of whom were Briſſot, Vergniaud, and Genſonne. On the twelfth of April Marat renewed his accuſation, and was ſupported by Robeſpierre. A violent tumult enſued, and the deputies on both ſides of the hall advanced with drawn ſwords to aſſault each other; by the authority of the preſident, it was, however, at length compoſed.

In the evening ſitting of the ſame day, the Gironde recriminated, and Guadet preſented a direct accuſation againſt Marat. As preſident of the Jacobin club, he had ſigned an addreſs, accuſing the Gironde party of being the accomplices of Dumourier; and exhorting the popular ſocieties to unite, and pour in a ſhower of petitions, "for the expulſion of thoſe unfaithful members who betrayed their truſt, and who did not vote for the death of the tyrant." The whole compoſition was in an extravagant ſtyle, and among other exclamations contained theſe words:—"Let us exterminate the conſpirators!" Marat alleged that he had ſigned the addreſs as preſident, without reading it; but juſtified the contents. The oppoſite party inſiſted on a decree of accuſation being paſſed againſt him; and on the appeal nominal being demanded, out of three hundred and thirty-ſix votes, two hundred and thirty-three were for the decree of accuſation, and eighty-two againſt it: twenty-two excuſed themſelves. Marat was accordingly committed to the abbey priſon.

From this deciſion of the convention, the predominating influence of the Gironde party in that body was ſufficiently apparent: but it was not ſo with the people; and the jury before whom Marat was arraigned, were either afraid to condemn him, or were themſelves of his party; for on the twenty-fourth of April he was unanimouſly acquitted. His party, not content with the acquittal of their favourite, attended him in a body to reſume his ſeat in the convention. A ſcene of indecent triumph enſued, and the hall of the legiſlature was once more occupied by the mob of Paris.

His opponents having proceeded to this extremity, it was not probable that Marat would deſiſt from hoſtilities; and he was now unfortunately too well aſſured of his own ſtrength to liſten eaſily to moderate counſels.

The Gironde, on the other hand, notwithſtanding their ſuperiority in the convention, could not fail to diſcover their tottering ſituation. It was evident they had loſt the confidence of the people of Paris, and the only chance for ſecuring their own authority was an appeal to the people of the more diſtant departments. With this view, on the thirteenth of May, on pretence of forwarding the new conſtitution, Condorcet propoſed—That a new convention ſhould be choſen on the firſt of November next enſuing, and that it ſhould meet on the fifteenth of December. The motion was vehemently oppoſed by Thuriot and others, who ſtrongly inſiſted that the convention could not abandon its poſt at ſo important a criſis, without manifeſt injury to the republic; that ſuch a meaſure would perſuade the people, that the leading perſons of that body had no ſerious deſign of giving them a conſtitution; and that ſuch alarms would lead to the moſt dangerous inteſtine commotions. The propoſal of Condorcet was on theſe reaſons adjourned.

The means propoſed by Condorcet would probably have proved inadequate to the end; and indeed nothing ſhort of convening a legiſlature to meet no longer in Paris, but in ſome other city, could, in this ſtate of affairs preſerve his party from deſtruction. On the eighteenth of May, therefore, a ſubſtitute deputy to the convention (one of thoſe who had been elected to ſupply ſuch ſeats as ſhould be vacated by abſence or by death) having been inſulted by ſome women, in his way to the convention, Guadet embraced the opportunity to inſiſt that the convention was no longer free in Paris; and that a plot had been formed for diſſolving the convention, and placing the whole power of the ſtate in the hands of the anarchiſts. He concluded by propoſing as a decree—"The national convention breaks and diſſolves all the conſtituted authorities of Paris; orders all the ſubſtitutes of deputies of the convention to unite at Bourges, without, however, exerciſing any function till authoriſed by a decree of the convention." Barrere thought the evil complained of did not require ſo violent a remedy; and on his motion it was decreed, "that a commiſſion of twelve members choſen from the convention ſhould examine all the plans and reſolutions formed by the commons of Paris."

In a debate which took place on the twentieth of May, on a propoſal of the finacier Cambon, for "a compulſory loan of a thouſand millions from rich egotiſts (ſelfiſh perſons,) the indifferent, and all who may be ſuppoſed intereſted in the ſucceſs of the enemies of France," Marat embraced the occaſion to arraign his adverſaries, and propoſed that the Rolandins, the Girondins, and Briſſotins, ſhould be ſelected, as the chief lenders.

A moſt tumultuous ſcene enſued, Barbaroux, La Riviere, and others of the Gironde party, exclaimed againſt a forced loan, as a tyrannical and counter-revolutionary meaſure. The galleries took a moſt indecent part in the debate, which was concluded by Vergniaud moving that an additional guard ſhould be demanded for the protection of the convention. On the ſame day a declaration was publiſhed by the preſident Iſnard, condemning in ſtrong terms the indecent ſcene which had juſt been acted, and charging the anarchiſts with being the accomplices of the combined kings.

On the twenty-third ſome deputies from the ſection of fraternity appeared at the bar to offer proofs of the plots in their ſection againſt liberty and the convention—They ſaid it had been agitated in a meeting held on the preceding Sunday and Monday, at the mayor's houſe, to "make another tenth of Auguſt buſineſs," which was to be followed by a maſſacre like that of the third of September. The mayor, however, had oppoſed theſe proceedings, and threatened to adjourn the aſſembly. Several deputations appeared on the ſame day from the different ſections engaging to protect the convention; and on the following day the mayor of Paris, Pache, addreſſed a letter to the preſident confirming the account of what had paſſed in the ſection of fraternity, but adding, that the mention of maſſacres had only proceeded from ſome heated individuals.

The city of Paris in the mean time continued in a ſtate of extreme agitation; and on the twenty-ſeventh the mayor wrote to the convention, that the contending parties were on the point of proceeding to extremities. Marat embraced the opportunity to throw the blame on the commiſſion of twelve, who he inſiſted had provoked the inſurrection of the people, and demanded that the commiſſion ſhould be diſſolved as the only means of preventing a general inſurrection. The ſection of la Cite at this moment appeared at the bar, and demanded the liberation of its preſident and ſecretary, who had been arreſted by the commiſſion of twelve; the deputation further inſiſted that the commiſſion of twelve ſhould be carried before the revolutionary tribunal. A moſt tumultuous debate aroſe, in which the galleries again took a part; and the preſident and commiſſion of twelve were vehemently threatened by the mountain party and their adherents in the galleries.

The evening ſitting was ſcarcely leſs tumultuous; but the convention underſtanding that twenty-eight of the ſections of Paris had determined to riſe and inſiſt on the diſmiſſion of the commiſſion of twelve, at length decreed that it ſhould be diſſolved, and that Hebert, a deputy of the convention, who had been impriſoned by their authority, ſhould be ſet at liberty.

The diſcuſſion was reſumed on the ſucceeding day, and it was attempted to decide by the appel nominal, whether the commiſſion ſhould be diſſolved agreeable to the vote of the preceding night. A ſcene of unprecedented confuſion enſued; and the preſident, having in vain attempted to reſtore order, reſigned his office. A new preſident was then ordered to be choſen, and the Jacobin (or mountain) party having ſucceeded in placing in the chair one of their own adherents, the diſſolution of the commiſſion was again decreed by a majority of forty-two votes; the members who compoſed it were denounced, and the perſons impriſoned by their orders were liberated. The ſitting concluded by a conciliatory ſpeech from Barrere, as organ of the committee of public ſafety, in which he repreſented in lively colours the dangers which threatened the republic on every ſide—recommended inſtant reinforcements to be ſent to the armies; and a union of thoſe parties who divided the national convention and the republic. By the advice of Barrere, the members of the commiſſion in the ſame ſitting gave in their reſignations.

The moderate party in the convention at the head of which was Barrere, now endeavoured to divert the attention of the public from theſe diſaſtrous conteſts to objects of real utility; and ſome decrees reſpecting public inſtruction were propoſed and paſſed on the twenty-ſeventh, as well as a plan for the renovation of the military force.

Every attempt to reſtore order and tranquillity was, however, in vain. The people had received a deep impreſſion that the public ſafety had been neglected by the Gironde party, and ſuſpected nothing but treachery and fraud. The conſtituted authorities of Paris were invited to aſſemble, to deliberate on the means of ſaving the country; it was then determined that the barriers ſhould be ſhut; and the council general publiſhed a proclamation exhorting the citizens to tranquillity.

At four o'clock, however, on the morning of the thirty-firſt the tocſin was ſounded, the generale was beaten, and the alarm gun was fired. The citizens repaired to their reſpective ſections, and a profound ſentiment of terror pervaded the whole city. At ſeven o'clock the convention aſſembled; the mayor and the miniſter of the interior were cited to the bar. The former declared that he had given the neceſſary orders to prevent the alarm guns being fired: and that he had repaired to the committee of public ſafety to give an account of the ſtate of Paris. He had afterwards repaired to the permanent council general of the commune, who had proceeded to ſuſpend the members of the municipality; but who were afterwards reſtored to their functions.

The proviſional commune at this moment appeared at the bar; they announced that, having been charged to diſcover a great conſpiracy, they were come to fulfil their miſſion; they then were proceeding to ſtate two reſolutions they had formed, when Guadet roſe to oppoſe this uſurpation of powers, which he ſaid belonged to the convention alone. He propoſed to annul all that had been done during the night by the revolutionary committees, and to bring before the proper tribunals the council of the commune, as well as thoſe who ſounded the tocſin, beat the generale, and ſhut up the barriers. The propoſal of Guadet was at firſt decreed; but, being warmly oppoſed by Thuriot and Lacroix, the decree was afterwards repealed.

While this affair was in agitation a deputation from the revolutionary committes appeared at the bar, and demanded—

1. The ſuppreſſion of the commiſſion of twelve.
2. A revolutionary army of ſans-cullottes.
3. A decree of accuſation againſt twenty-two deputies and the members of the above named commiſſion.
4. A diminution of the price of bread.
5. The diſpatch of commiſſioners to the ſouthern provinces, there to put a ſtop to the counter-revolution. And,
6. The arreſt of Claviere the miniſter of finance, and Le Brun the miniſter of foreign affairs.

The department of Paris next appeared, and demanded a decree of accuſation againſt Iſnard, Briſſot, Guadet, Vergniaud, Genſonné, Barbaroux, Roland, Claviere, Lebrun, Leſage, &c.

The mayor of Paris was afterwards called to the bar, and declared, that the cauſe of the diſturbances was the conduct of the commiſſion of twelve; and that the conſtituted authorities, far from riſing againſt the convention, were endeavouring to quiet the people.

The morning ſitting of the firſt of June paſſed without any thing extraordinary being tranſacted, except that an addreſs from the convention to the people propoſed by Barrere was adopted through the influence of the mountain party, in preference to one offered by Lasource. This circumstance may be considered as the first mark of the former deputy having relinquished the party of the Gironde.

At six o'clock in the evening the tocsin was again sounded, and the generale beaten. The pretended cause of the disturbance was the neglect of the convention to determine on the petition of the department of Paris on the preceding day; and as soon as the convention met, a deputation from that department presented themselves at the bar, and demanded immediate attention to the subject of their petition, and that Ducos, Fonfrede, and Dussaulx, should be added to the list of denounced members. The sitting concluded with a decree passed on the motion of Barrere—"That the committee of public safety "should present within three days the means which should appear best calculated to des- "troy the external and internal enemies of the republic; and the same committee should "immediately make a report respecting the deputies under accusation."

On the next day, the second of June, the suburbs of St. Antoine and St. Marceau were again in motion. An immense crowd surrounded the hall of the convention and were violent in their demand that a decree of accusation should be passed, several members entered and complained that they had been insulted by the mob, and that their deliberations were no longer free. A deputation was then sent out to address the people; but they were scarcely able to obtain a hearing, and were only answered by indistinct clamours for a decree of accusation. After the return of the deputation a tumultuous debate took place. The acclamation that "the convention was no longer free in its deliberations" resounded through the hall. Barrere, in the name of the committee of public safety, proposed that the accused deputies should resign their seats, and that there should be an entire charge of ministers. With this requisition some of the members complied, but others refused to abdicate a character with which they had been invested by the people. Lasource demanded that the armed force should withdraw, and Barrere proposed to march in a body out of the hall among the people. Agreeably to this proposal the president led the way, and the whole convention proceeded without molestation through the midst of the crowd, and after making the circuit of the Thuilleries returned to the hall. The populace however remained, and before the convention rose a decree was passed ordering the following members to be arrested, Gensonne, Vergniaud, Brissot, Gaudet, Gorsas, Petion, Salles, Cambon, Barbaroux, Buzot, Biroteau, Rabaut, Lasource, Lanjuinais, Grangeneuve, Lesage, Louvet, Valazé, Doulcet, Ducos, Lanthenas, Dussaulx, all the members of the commission of twelve, Fonfrede and St. Martin, excepted, and the ministers Claviere and Le Brun. On the request of Marat and others Ducos, Dussaulx, and Lanthenas were afterwards excepted. Such was the important transaction which the mountain party dignified with the appellation of the revolution of the thirty-first of May.

The deputies ordered under arrest published an address to the people of France, in which they professed to develope the causes of the commotions. Their account differs from the preceding, and deserves on the principles of justice a fair examination, it is as follows:—

"Frenchmen,—When the liberty of the national representation is no more, and truth is stifled, the temple of the laws must be shut. Thus, unable to execute the trust reposed in us, it is our indispensable duty to instruct you. We shall entirely confine ourſelves to evident facts, and leave to you the care of drawing the neceſſary conſequences from them.

" A law had been enacted, which preſcribed the formation of committees in the different ſections of Paris, deſtined to watch over foreigners and ſuſpicious people. This law was eluded. Inſtead of thoſe committees, others were formed in the moſt illegal manner, contrary to the letter of the law as well as its intention.

" Theſe illegal revolutionary committees have created a central committee, compoſed of one member from every committee of each ſection. This central committee, after ſome clandeſtine deliberations, has ſuſpended the conſtituted authorities; it has aſſumed the title of the revolutionary council of the department of Paris, and has inveſted itſelf, with a dictatorial power; or rather has uſurped it.

" An extraordinary committee had been decreed within the boſom of the convention, to denounce the illegal and arbitrary acts of the different conſtituted authorities of the republic; to trace and diſcover the plots formed againſt the liberty and ſecurity of the national repreſentation, and to cauſe all perſons to be arreſted who ſhould be denounced as chiefs of conſpiracies. Surrounded by an armed force, thoſe revolutionary committees demanded, on the twenty-ſeventh of May, the ſuppreſſion of this commiſſion. Their requeſt was decreed, but on the next day, on a vote by names, it was deferred till the committee ſhould have made their report.—(They conſtantly refuſed to attend the report.) On the thirtieth the revolutionary council intimated to the convention their order to ſuppreſs the extraordinary commiſſion. Amidſt armed petitioners, ſurrounded by cannon, under continual hiſſings and hootings from the galleries, ſome members decreed the ſuppreſſion of the commiſſion. On the thirty-firſt the generale was again beat; the tocſin ſounded, and the alarm-gun fired. At theſe ſignals all the citizens took up arms, and were ordered to aſſemble around the convention. Some deputations demanded a decree of accuſation againſt thirty-five of the members of the convention. The aſſembly who before had unanimouſly rejected this petition, as calumnious, when in the month of April it was brought forward by ſome of the ſections, ſupported by the municipality, now referred it to the committee of public ſafety, and enjoined the members of that committee to give in their report within three days. On the firſt of June, at three in the afternoon, the revolutionary council marched their armed force to inveſt the national hall; at night they appeared at the bar, and demanded a decree of accuſation againſt the denounced members. The convention paſſed to the order of the day, and ordered the petitioners to depoſit with the committee of public ſafety the proofs of the crimes imputed to the accuſed deputies.

" Since the thirtieth of May, the barriers had been ſhut, the adminiſtrators of the poſt ſuſpended, the journals ſtopped, the mails ſearched, the letters broken open and ſealed again, either with a ſeal bearing this inſcription—Revolution of the thirty-firſt of May 1793; or with another, inſcribed—The committee of public ſafety.

" The committee of public ſafety were waiting for the neceſſary proofs to make their report, when on Sunday, June the ſecond, the revolutionary council appeared again at the bar, and demanded for the laſt time, the decree of accuſation againſt the denounced members. The aſſembly paſſed again to the order of the day. The petitioners now gave a ſignal to the ſpectators to leave the hall and run to arms, for the purpoſe of obtaining that by open force which juſtice would not grant. About twelve at noon, the generale was beat, the tocſin ſounded. The citizens were forced to take up arms, and obey the order of a commander whom the revolutionary council had placed at their head; more than one hundred cannons ſurrounded the national hall; grates to heat red hot balls were placed in the Champs Elyſees.

" The guard of the convention, as well as all true citizens, were confined in different guard-houſes; cannon were pointed towards all the avenues; the gates were ſhut, and the ſentries ordered to ſtop all the deputies who might attempt to paſs them, and to fire on every one who ſhould peep acroſs the bars. Duſſaulx, the venerable Duſſaulx, was beaten in a moſt infamous manner;—Boiſſy d'Anglas had his ſhirt torn; a great number of other deputies were inſulted by the vile ſatellites of Marat. The battalions which ſeveral days back ſhould have marched to La Vendée, arrived on a ſudden and ſeized upon the inner poſts of the hall. Aſſignats and wine were diſtributed among them. Theſe troops were deſtined to aſſaſſinate your repreſentatives, and would have done it, becauſe the national-guards were not able to prevent this ſlaughter. The aſſailants were provided with the beſt arms, whilſt the ſections complained of the want of them. In ſhort, the national hall was turned into a priſon, where the repreſentatives of the people were threatened, diſgraced, and inſulted. It was demanded, that the committee of public ſafety, to calm the rage of the ſeduced people who inveſted the hall, ſhould make their report.

" Barrere mounted the tribune, and ſpeaking in the name of the committee, propoſed, that the denounced members againſt whom no proof whatever of the crimes imputed to them had been produced, ſhould be invited to ſuſpend themſelves from their functions. Some of them ſubmitted to this meaſure. A decree paſſed, that the commander of the armed force ſhould be ordered to the bar, to account for his conduct, and inform the convention from whom he had received his orders?—This decree was not executed. Two of the factious invaders inſulted a deputy, and were ordered to be taken to the bar. Violence and open force oppoſed alſo the execution of the ſecond decree. Then it was requeſted that the ſitting ſhould be ended, and the temple of the laws ſhut. An end was put to the ſitting, the preſident walked out of the hall at the head of the convention, and ordered the ſentries to withdraw.

" The convention reached the middle of the court without meeting any reſiſtance, but being arrived there, the commander of the armed force ordered them to return. The preſident told him, that the convention was not to be dictated to; that it held its authority independent of any other than the French people, and that they alone had a right to command it. The commander, Henriot, drew his ſword, ranged his cavalry in order of battle, and ordered the cannoneers to point their cannon. His ſoldiers were ready to fire—the preſident turned back, the members followed him, and attempted every outlet in order to eſcape, but every avenue was cloſed, or defended by cannon.—At length, the convention, unable to retire, reſumed their ſitting. What do we ſay? They returned into their priſon, and ſome members decreed, that Genſonne, Guadet, Briſſot, Gorſas, Petion, Vergniaud, Salles, Barbaroux, Chambon, Buzot, Biroteau, Lidon, Rabaut, Laſource, Lanjuinais, Grangeneuve, Le Hardy, Le Sage, Kervelegan, Gardien, Boileau, Bertrand, Vigee, Mollévaut, Lariviere, Gomaire, and Bergoin, ſhould be put under arreſt in their own houſes. And why?—We muſt not forget to mention, that on the propoſal of Marat, Couthon demanded, that Valazé and Louvet ſhould be added to that number, and that ſome members gave their conſent, for the greater part did not take any ſhare in theſe humiliating deliberations. After the decree was ſigned, a deputation made its appearance to teſtify its approbation of the decree, and tendered an equal number of citizens to ſerve as hoſtages for the arreſted members.

" Frenchmen! who would be free and republicans, theſe are facts, which no one will dare to deny; we repreſent them only to you in a maſs, and forbear to enter into details ſtill more atrocious. The national repreſentation, impriſoned, diſgraced, deliberating under the poignards of an audacious faction, is no more. Do not ſuffer any longer the uſurpation of your rights; do not leave in ſuch hands the exerciſe of the ſovereignty of the nation; reſcue the liberty, the ſacred equality, the unity, and indiviſibility of the Republic:—without them France is loſt. Reject with horror all propoſitions tending to any kind of federaliſm. Rally, unite, and be firm, you may ſtill ſave the public cauſe. This public cauſe reſides in the whole of your country; it is not confined nor concentrated within the walls of Paris. Your deputies may there periſh, but they will die worthy of themſelves; too happy, if after their death, their country ſhall be ſaved. When the moment of national revenge is come, then Frenchmen, do not forget that Paris is not guilty, that the citizens of Paris were ignorant of the plot, of which they have been made the blind tools. No! it is not upon Paris that the dreadful and all-powerful hand of the nation ought to bear down; but on that horde of robbers and criminals, who have made themſelves maſters of Paris, who are devouring Paris and France, who cannot exiſt without crimes, and have no other refuge left but in deſpair, the offspring of vice. Farewell!"

Before we enter further into theſe unhappy ſcenes, it will be important to throw ſome light upon the ſpirit of party at this time. But theſe movements of denunciation were wrought by the machinations of ſubordinate factions, in a greater degree than poſſibly has been hitherto completely devulged; there has however appeared ſufficient evidence to prove that the commotions of the tenth of March were wrought by a club that met at the Corazza coffee-houſe; to this club belonged Chabot, Desfieux, Guzman, Collot, L'Huillier, and Varlet a youth of not twenty years of age, who had nevertheleſs been concerned in every tumult that had occured for the four preceding years. There was alſo among them one Proli, a natural ſon of prince Kaunitz, and an intimate of Robeſpierre, who traded as a merchant.

In the breaſts of thoſe who mingled in the conteſts of the two ſides of the convention, glowed all the paſſions that tend naturally to kindle revolt. Almoſt all the nations of the earth have fabricated temples to the deſtinies, and in that temple repreſented deities, good and evil, contending among themſelves for the right of emitting thoſe decrees which are to regulate the fortunes of mankind. The allegory is ſtriking and is ſuſceptible of application in all the tranſactions of civil life. Repeated evidence has been given of the diviſion of the convention into parties from its firſt inſtitution. There were few in it who poſſeſſed that energy of neutrality, which is in great convulſions ſo rare, becauſe the paſſions cry it down under the names of imbecility or treachery. The conteſt was between all who ſat on one ſide and all who ſat on the other, and reſembled two diſtinct aſſemblies producing daily accuſations in the preſence of the republic.

The right ſide ſaid to the left ſide: " The legiſlators of a great republic ought to be animated with the moſt ſincere reſpect and love for humanity; and you, all polluted as you are, with the blood ſhed upon the ſecond and third days of September, cannot be fit perſons to give laws to France. The legiſlators of an empire, deſtined by the fertility of its territorial ſoil, the genius of the inhabitants, and the great ſhare which it engroſſes of the commerce of the univerſe, deſtined by theſe advantages, to attain to the moſt fortunate pitch of general proſperity, ought to regard property as one of the moſt ſacred fundamental principles of ſocial order. Surely, then, the functions of legiſlators of France cannot be fulfilled by you, who preach anarchy, who protect pillage, who promulgate principles by which proprietors are brought into terror, who excite thoſe who have no poſſeſſions but vice and miſery, againſt thoſe who are eaſy in the circumſtances of their fortune, and not deſtitute of virtues. The abuſe of liberty has ever proved its ruin; and you puſh the revolution to every diſorderly exceſs to which it can be perverted. After long anarchy, tyranny always ſtarts up; and you are the men by whom anarchy is, in all quarters, fomented and maintained. Who is there ſo blind as not to ſee, that your ſallies of patrotiſm are merely the diſguiſe and the engines of all the evil propoſes by which you are violently driving, to reduce the riſing republic into the moſt abject ſervitude? Is the furious extravagance of your apparent patriotiſm any pledge that you are incapable of perfidy? No man was ever more perfidious than Cromwell; yet no man ever diſplayed more of the furious extravagance of zeal. Of all animals, a tyger is, at once, the moſt blood-thirſty and the moſt cunning. You have put to death a king who was not of your own creation; but, you have among you one of the Bourbons, who hopes, that you will exalt him upon the vacant throne; it was in a dependence upon the mutual faith of robbers to one another, that he gave his vote for the death of him who he regards as his own predeceſſor. True republicans have no wealth, but you ſcatter gold and ſilver with boundleſs profuſion, wherever there are corrupt minds to be bought, and venal hands to be armed. You are for ever whetting the aſſaſſin's daggers for ſlaughter; and to maſſacre the citizens of the republic, is to murder the republic itſelf. You inſtigate againſt us all the ruffian cut-throats in Paris, We invoke to our aid againſt you, all the honeſt men in France.'

The left ſide again ſaid to the right: 'So much oſtentatious talk of your virtues, unavoidably excites us to ſuſpect, that you have vices and guilty projects to hide under this aſſumed diſguiſe. Such pride of talents and illumination of mind, convinces us that you propoſe to employ your talents for your own aggrandiſement, not to promote the intereſts of general equality. In your hands liberty would ſoon be ſtrangled. When the thunders of national vengence ſtruck a guilty monarch, you had not ceaſed to pay your court, and to offer your vows of allegiance to the criminal. While he allowed you to rule in his name, by the miniſtration of ſervants whom you had reccommended to him; you then thought him ſufficiently faithful to the nation. You did not begin to look upon him as a traitor, till he fruſtrated the views of your ambition, as well as betrayed the nation. Your ſecret wiſhes never were to exalt France to the glorious deſtiny of a great republic, but to preſerve it under the mock government of a king, whom you might accuſe and protect, by turns; who ſhould be your priſoner, and you the mayors of his palace. Upon your plan, the king would have enjoyed a ſhadowy royalty; the nation would have had but a ſhadow of liberty; the only realities left, would have been your tyranny, and uſurped power. You baſe men, who think formal tricks and low artifices to be all the ſcience of a ſtateſman; know that true republicans advance with intrepid rapidity along thoſe broad paths which they open up for themſelves; and that the crafty politicians are men who, like you, ſlowly inſinuate themſelves through thoſe obliquities which they have marked out and waved for themſelves. When the tyrant appeared before the national juſtice, of which you and we were the organs, we pronounced ſentence of death upon him; but, you, who wiſhed to ſave his life which you wanted for the purpoſe of your cabals, when, to ſhare our glory, you voted, with us, for his death, propoſed, in addition, an appeal to the people, in order to ſave the tyrant whom you pretended to condemn. By this act alone, ſtateſmen worthy of Borgia and his preceptor! you procured us to be abhorred as men of ſavage cruelty, you procured yourſelves to be adored, as eminently juſt; and you have conjured up a civil war, to rend France in pieces, to divide it into fœderal ſtates, of which you hoped to be the ſole legiſlators, conſuls, ephori, archontes. You have ſcarely at all deplored the effuſion of republican blood, ſhed in this war againſt Europe, which the eager wiſhes of the people indeed contributed to kindle, but which your motions ultimately ſerved to excite. But, the effuſion of blood ſhed in the priſons for the ſafety, and by the vengeance of the people, you would at all rates avenge. It was the blood of ariſtocrats. What mean your continual cries againſt us, as endeavouring to aboliſh all property? What mean they,—but you wiſh to have at your command an army of proprietors, whom you may employ againſt us? an army which you would not pay, but receive pay from them! What mean thoſe eternal clamors that you deliberate with the daggers of aſſaſſins at your breaſts; that three hundred legiſlators are three hundred murderers, ever watching for opportunities to butcher the other three hundred members of the legiſlative body? Piſiſtratus did more than raiſe a cry about aſſaſſins; he wounded himſelf and his mules; and on the morrow, Piſiſtratus was encompaſſed with his guards, and the tyrant of his country. Stateſmen, your wiſhes are, at the beſt, but for liberty without equality: but, we, whom you call ſavages, becauſe we are as inflexible as the eternal principles of the rights of man,—we deſire equality, for no other reaſon, but becauſe, in our judgment, liberty can have no exiſtence without it. Stateſmen, you ſeek to eſtabliſh a republic for the peculiar benefit of the rich, amidſt whoſe riches, a republican conſtitution would quickly periſh: We, however, who are not ſtateſmen, but plain men of nature, deſtitute of art and ſcience, but inſtinctively inſpired with the ſentiments and the energies of virtue,—we ſeek laws which may relieve the poor man from miſery, and diſencumber the rich of their opulence; which, diffuſing general and equal plenty and comfort, may make us all the happy citizens, and the zealous defenders of a republic which will remain while the world endures, and ſhall ever command the wondering approbation of all mankind. Stateſmen, it is by and for that multitude by you dreaded or deſpiſed; it is by and for the people who commenced and have carried on the revolution; yes, it is by and for them alone, that we deſire to perfect it. Beware; the people may be, for a while, deceived by their oppreſſors; but, their paſſions take arms with inconceivable impetuoſity in behalf of their moſt paſſionate friends. Beware of forcing us to call the furious paſſions of the people to the defence of their rights, and of our lives. You ſhall, in that event, periſh; and the blood of private citizens, of all parties, muſt flow, and mingle with the ſtreaming blood of legiſlators of both ſides in the convention.

If you be not traitors and conſpirators relinquiſh your pride at the proſpect of thoſe ills with which your country is threatened.'

This is rather a mitigated abſtract of their accuſations, and theſe were not confined to the convention, but uttered in private converſation and aggravated by malicious enlargement. A converſation of the miniſter of juſtice Garat, with two of the leading men of the convention, and within the ſpace of two days, Salles of the Gironde, and Robeſpierre of the mountain, will illuſtrate the paſſions of party at this period, and the characters of the perſons themſelves.

Garat was of opinion that both parties were deſirous for the eſtabliſhment of the republic—at leaſt he had no doubt of either at the time. It was before the tenth of March, and by his own deſire that Robeſpierre gave Garat a meeting; in conſenting he ſhewed a degree of inſolence, and gave him ſcarcely time to ſay he wiſhed to ſpeak to him about the quarrels in the convention—"All thoſe deputies of the Gironde," ſaid Robeſpierre, impatiently, "Briſſot, Louvet, Barbaroux, are, without exception, counter-revolutioniſts, and conſpirators." I could not help ſmiling, at which he was exceedingly exaſperated—"This has always been your way," ſaid he, "in the conſtituent aſſembly you were inclined to think the ariſtocrats friendly to the revolution."—I never went quite ſo far. At the utmoſt, I thought only, that ſome of the nobles might not be ariſtocrats. I thought ſo of ſeveral among them; and you yourſelf are ſtill of the ſame mind in reſpect to ſome of them. I cannot help thinking ſtill, that we might have gained even ſome of the ariſtocrats, if, of two different means which were in our power force or reaſon, we had choſen oftener to employ reaſon, which was ſolely upon our ſide, and force more rarely, which was capable of being, likewiſe, ſooner or later, on the ſide of the tyrants. Let me perſuade you to forget thoſe dangers which we have now ſurmounted, and which had nothing in common with thoſe which now threaten us. The war was then between the friends and the enemies of liberty! It is now between the divided friends of the republic.—Had I an opportunity, I ſhould tell Louvet, that he is abſurd in ſuppoſing you a royaliſt; but I muſt ſay to you, that Louvet is no more a royaliſt than yourſelf. In your quarrels, you reſemble the Moloniſts and the Janſeniſts; whoſe whole diſpute turned upon the manner in which divine grace acts upon the ſoul of man; and who yet accuſed one another of not believing in the exiſtence of God. "If they be not royaliſts, why were they ſo anxious to ſave the life of a king? I could wager that you likewiſe were inclined to the ſide of mercy, of clemency, as you call it."—I ſhould not be afraid to declare my opinion; but it is not the matter now in queſtion. I probably would not have refuſed to inflict the puniſhment of death upon a man charged with ſuch enormous crimes. But my opinion did not accord preciſely with any opinion that had been publicly propoſed in the convention. As to clemency, it is the diſpoſition of mind moſt natural to republicans and conquerors: and a dead enemy may often do more harm than if he had been living.—"That is a very refined notion." That, to me, appears plain truth. "You, then, diſapprove the ſentence of condemnation to death, which you notified at the Temple; and did my ſpeech then ſeem horrible to you?" I might diſapprove the ſentence, though I officially notified it: but, if I had thought it abſolutely unjuſt, I would then have given in my reſignation, and would not have gone to the Temple. It was your ſpeech that rapidly brought the ſcale of condemnation to preponderate in the balance of national juſtice. Barrere's ſpeech finally fixed the preponderancy, upon the ſame ſide. Would you have me freely declare what I think of your ſpeech?—"Yes."—Of all the ſpeeches delivered on that occaſion, yours made incomparably the moſt powerful impreſſion upon my mind. Your fundamental idea is new, and unexpected, and abſolutely confounds with aſtoniſhment the judgement of the hearer or reader: the ſtyle is bold and elegant: it abounds in paſſages glowing with paſſion, and in ſkilful tranſitions: it is an effort of genius; but, I confeſs, the logic of it appears to me very extraordinary, and entirely falſe. You prove ſucceſsfully enough, that it would have been lawful to put Capet to death on the tenth of Auguſt, either in the caſtle, or in the box of the Logographe, in the national convention, in which he took refuge. It would have been but the exerciſe of the right of war. But the right which war gives of putting an enemy to death is confined in its operation to the time of battle. When the battle is over the right of ſlaughter ceaſes. None but Tartars think themſelves at liberty to butcher their priſoners in cold blood: none but the ſavages of the American foreſts, think they have a right to devour the captives taken in war. Your ſpeech may be a model of eloquence; but it is nevertheleſs a ſpecimen of inconcluſive logic: to your leading principles, there muſt be other principles added, in order to prove, that the law, condemning Capet to the block, was a grand act of national juſtice, on the part of France; and to the whole world, a great and conſpicuous example, more lawful, more neceſſary, more uſeful, than the example of the trial and execution of Charles the Firſt of England.—"And what matters it, upon what principle, the death of the tyrant was found to be juſt and neceſſary? Your Girondines, your Briſſot, your appellants to the people, ſtrove to ſave him. They were willing to leave to tyranny all the means neceſſary to enable it once more to exalt itſelf upon our necks."

I know not, whether it was the intention of the appellants to the people, to ſave Louis from ſuffering death. The appeal to the people always appeared to me a meaſure raſh and dangerous. But I can conceive, how thoſe who voted for it might be led to think, be-that Capet, alive and a priſoner, might amidſt the ſhocks and fluctuations of events, come more uſeful to the people, as a means for doing honor to a republican nation in the eyes of the whole world, by affording them an opportunity to exerciſe in their own names, a great act of generoſity, in an act of ſovereignty. "This is, certainly, to aſcribe excellent intentions, to meaſures of which you could not approve, and to men who form conſpiracies in every quarter."—And where do they form conſpiracies?—"Every where. In Paris, in all France, in all Europe. Genſonné conſpires in the ſuburb of St. Antoine; going there about from ſhop to ſhop, to perſuade the merchants, we patriots are preparing to pillage their ſhops and warehouſes. The Gironde has long ſince formed the deſign of detaching itſelf from France, and joining England; its leading deputies are the authors of the plan, and have determined to carry it into execution, at all events. Genſonné makes no ſecret of this; but tells any one who is willing to liſten to him, that here they are not repreſentatives of the nation, but plenipotentiaries of the Gironde. Briſſot conſpires in his journal, which is the alarm-bell to a civil war. We know that he is gone to England, and know his reaſons for going thither. We are not ſtrangers to his intimate connecton with that miniſter for foreign affairs, that Le Brun, who is a native of Liege, and a creature of the houſe of Auſtria. The beſt friend Briſſot has is Claviere; and Claviere has carried conſpiracy wherever he has himſelf turned his footſteps. Rabaut, a proteſtant, a philoſopher, and therefore a traitor, has not had art enough to hide from us his correſpondence with that courtier and traitor, Monteſquiou. For theſe ſix months, they have been concerting together, how to open Savoy and France to the invaſion of the Piedmonteſe. Servan has been named general, for no other end, but to deliver up the keys of France to the Spaniards. Dumourier's threats are directed more againſt Paris than Holland. And when that quack-hero came hither, where it was my wiſh to arreſt him, it was not with the mountain he daily dined, but with the miniſters and the Girondines." Three or four times with me, for inſtance.—" I am weary of the revolution; I am ſick of it: never was country in greater danger than ours now is; and I doubt whether we ſhall be able to extricate it. Well then! are you now diſpoſed to laugh and regard thoſe people as honeſt men, and good republicans?"—No; I am no longer diſpoſed to laugh; but I hardly refrain from ſhedding thoſe tears which are due to the misfortunes of our country, when I ſee her legiſlators preyed upon by ſuſpicions ſo atrocious, and ſo ſlenderly ſupported by probability. I am ſure, that there is no truth in theſe ſuſpicions of yours; but ſtill ſurer that theſe ſuſpicions are themſelves a very real, and a very great danger. Almoſt all theſe men are at preſent your enemies; but none of them, ſave Dumourier, is the enemy of the republic. And if all parties could lay aſide their reciprocal grudges, the republic would be no more in danger.—" Do not you propoſe to me to repeat the motion of biſhop Lamouret?"—No; I have at leaſt ſufficiently profited by the leſſons you have given me: and three national aſſemblies have taken pains to inſtruct me, that the beſt patriots hate their enemies ſtill more than they love their country. But, I have a queſtion to put to you; and I entreat you to recollect yourſelf before you make me an anſwer. Have you any doubts about any part of what you have ſaid to me? " None at all." I left him, upon this, and retired in great aſtoniſhment, and even horror, at what I had heard.'

Some days after this, going out from the executive council, Garat met Salles coming out of the national convention. The circumſtances of the time had continued to become more and more alarming. None who had any eſteem for one another, could meet, without being moved to enter into converſation concerning the critical ſituatian of the commonwealth.

What is this! ſaid he to Salles, accoſting him. 'Are there no means by which we may contrive to pacify theſe angry contentions?—" O, yes, I hope there are. I hope ſhortly to withdraw the veils which hide the villanies of thoſe men, and of their conſpiracies, from public view. But, as for you, I know that you have always a blind confidence and a fooliſh reſolution to believe nothing." You do me wrong. I reaſon like others; but, I muſt have ſtrong preſumptions, not bare ſuſpicions; atteſted facts, not imaginary ones. Why ſhould you ſuppoſe me ſo incredulous? Is it becauſe I would not believe you in the year 1789, when you aſſured me that Necker robbed the treaſury: and that the mules had been ſeen loaded with gold and ſilver, by which he ſent millions to Geneva? My incredulity on that ſcore I confeſs proved incorrigible; for I am even now convinced, that Necker has left here more millions of his own than he has carried of ours to Geneva.—" Necker was a paltry raſcal."—But that was nothing to the ſcoundrels who now ſwarm about us; and it is of them I would ſpeak to you, were you willing to hear me. " Moſt willingly ſhall I hear you:" and, to be more ſecure from interruption, they went into the hall of the executive council, in which there was then no perſon.—"I ſhall tell you all;" ſaid Salles, "for I know it all. I have detected all their dark intrigues. All the plots, all the crimes of the mountain, began with the revolution. Orleans is the head of that knot of villains. He is the author of the infernal romance of the 'dangerous connections,' which has planned all the crimes committed by them, during theſe laſt five years. The traitor, Lafayette, was their accomplice; and he it was, who, by pretending to diſconcert the plot at its origin, ſent D'Orleans into England, to arrange all with Pitt, the prince of Wales, and the court of St. James's. Mirabeau was alſo a party in this plot. He took money from the king to conceal his connections with D'Orleans; but he had ſtill more money from D'Orleans to bribe him to his intereſts. The grand affair for the party of D'Orleans, was, to bring the Jacobins to enter into their deſigns. This they durſt not directly attempt: they firſt addreſſed themſelves to the Cordeliers. Among the Cordelier ſociety, all was at once ſold and devoted to them. Obſerve, that the Cordeliers have always been leſs numerous, and have always made leſs noiſe than the Jacobins. Their deſire is to make all the world their tools; but not to make all the world depoſitaries of their ſecrets. The Cordeliers have always been the centre of conſpiracy: It is there that Danton, the moſt dangerous of all the conſpirators, tutors and excites them to audacity and falſehood, while Marat ſpirits them up to aſſaſſination and maſſacre. It is there they rehearſe the parts they are to act among the Jacobins. The Jacobins, who ſeem as if they led all France, are themſelves notoriouſly led by the Cordeliers. The Cordeliers, who ſeem to be hidden in a corner of Paris, negociate with all Europe, and have envoys in all the courts which have vowed the ruin of our liberty. The fact is certain. I am in poſſeſſion of indubitable proofs of it. The Cordeliers, after overwhelming one throne in a deluge of blood, are preparing to ſhed new torrents of it, in order to raiſe a new throne for the trophy of their ſlaughters. They know that the right ſide, on which is all the virtue of the convention, is alſo the ſide on which are all the true republicans. If they accuſe us of royaliſm, it is for no other reaſon, but becauſe they want a pretext to let looſe upon us the fury of the multitude, but becauſe they can eaſier find daggers than arguments, to oppoſe us. In one ſingle conſpiracy there are three or four others. When the right ſide ſhall have been entirely deſtroyed, then comes the duke of York to take poſſeſſion of the throne; and D'Orleans, who has promiſed him the throne of France, will then aſſaſſinate him. D'Orleans himſelf will be aſſaſſinated by Marat, Danton, and Robeſpierre, who have made him a promiſe of the throne. The triumvirs will then ſhare among them, all ſmoaking, bleeding, France. At laſt, Danton, the ableſt of the three, will aſſaſſinate the other two, and reign alone, firſt under the title of dictator, afterwards, openly under that of king. This, you may be ſure, is their plan. By ſagacious reflection I have found it out: every thing concurs to prove it evidently. See you not how all the circumſtances connect and hang together? There is not an event in the revolution, but is a part and proof of theſe horrible plots. You are aſtoniſhed, I ſee; can you poſſibly be incredulous?"—I am, indeed, aſtoniſhed; but, pray, are there many among us, many on your ſide of the houſe, who think with you upon this head?—"All, or almoſt all, are of the ſame mind. Condorcet once ſuggeſted ſome objections. Sieyes has very little communication with us. Rabaut has a different plan, which, in many particulars, nearly agrees with mine, in others widely different from it. But none of them is at all more doubtful than I, of the truth of what I have told you. They all feel the neceſſity of acting with promptitude, in order to prevent a multitude of crimes and misfortunes, in order that we may not loſe the benefits of a revolution that has coſt us ſo dear. On the right ſide there are members who have not ſufficient confidence in you. But I, who have been your colleague, who know you to be an honeſt man, and a friend to liberty, aſſure them, that you are of us, and are willing to employ in our favour all thoſe means of ſerving us which your office has put into your hands. Can you be in the ſmalleſt uncertainty reſpecting the truth of what I have told you concerning thoſe raſcals?"—I ſhould be altogether unworthy of the eſteem you expreſs for me, if I could leave you to think that I fully believe the truth of that plan which you ſuppoſe your enemies to have concerted againſt you. The more facts, perſons, and circumſtances, you introduce into your accounts of this plan, ſo much the more probable does it ſtill appear to you, ſtill the more improbable to me. Moſt of thoſe facts, out of which you make up this imagined plot of conſpiracy, have had an obvious intent, which there is no occaſion to aſcribe fictitiouſly to them: you, however, attribute to them a purpoſe which does not belong to them. Yet, to induce us to reject a natural explanation for the ſake of one more far-fetched, proofs are requiſite, both in oppoſition to the former, and for the ſupport of the latter. For inſtance, all the world believe, that Lafayette and D'Orleans were enemies to each other; and that it was in order to deliver Paris, France, and the national aſſembly, that D'Orleans was perſuaded or compelled by Lafayette to retire for ſome time out of France. You muſt ſhew, not only by aſſertion, but by proofs, 1ſt. That they were not enemies; 2dly. That they were accomplices: 3dly. That D'Orleans's retreat to England was intended for the purpoſe of carrying their plots into execution. I know that, inſiſting upon ſuch ſtrength and clearneſs of proof, may have a tendency to ſuffer crimes and misfortunes to come too near, before means are uſed for preventing and providing againſt them. But, I know alſo that, when we give way to all the ſuggeſtions of imagination, we are unavoidably betrayed into the folly of theory, in reſpect to both preſent and future events: we loſe the fit means for diſcerning through preſent events, and juſtly appreciating them. We dream of a thouſand crimes and intrigues which no body meditates, and we become blind to theſe ills which actually menace us. I doubt not but we have many villians among us. When every paſſion is let looſe, and when foreign gold is laviſhly offered to corrupt, this muſt unavoidably happen. But, truſt me, their projects, although atrociouſly wicked, are neither ſo enlarged, ſo grand, ſo comprehenſive, ſo ſkilfully conceived, nor built upon relations ſo remote, as you ſeem to apprehend. They are more robbers and aſſaſſins than deep conſpirators. The true conſpirators againſt the republic are the kings of Europe, with all their regiments. To prevent our paſſions from accompliſhing our overthrow, there is one means, and but one. Without delay, frame and eſtabliſh a form of government, which may have due energy, and may deſerve the confidence of the nation. In that ſtate into which, by your quarrels, the government has fallen, a democracy even of five and twenty millions of angels would ſoon become a prey to all the fury and diſcords inſpired by pride. As Jean Jacques ſays; we have need of five and twenty millions of gods; but nobody has ever imagined the exiſtence of ſo many. My dear Salles, men and great aſſemblies are not ſo conſtituted, as if there were on the one hand, none but gods; on the other, none but devils. Wherever mankind are divided by jarring intereſts and opinions; even the good are not free from the influence of bad paſſions; and even the bad, if their hearts and purpoſes be fairly examined, are not inſuſceptible of honeſt and good impreſſions. To find within my own breaſt, a clear and irrefragable proof of at leaſt one half of this truth; I am conſcious of meaning as well as any one among you; yet when inſtead of refuting my opinions with gentleneſs and ſound argument, they are repelled with ſuſpicion and abuſe, I am ready to break off farther reaſoning, and to look whether my piſtols be charged. A brave man will not aſk a furlough, or give in his reſignation on the evening before a battle. The battle, I can foreſee, is not far diſtant.'

From paſſions ſo extravagant and malign, effects the moſt terrible were to be apprehended, and the fate of the proſcribed deputies could not be doubted, conſidering the diſtracted ſtate of the public mind. The conduct of the triumphant party in the midſt of theſe convulſions was governed ſtill with a view to the temper of the people; after the commotions of the early part of June had ſubſided, on the twenty-third of that month they iſſued a declaration of the rights of man; as a preface to the new form of government, which is contained in thirty-five articles. It ſtates, that the end of ſociety is the general happineſs; the rights of man are equal liberty, ſafety, and the protection of property — a free people know no other motive of preference in their election to offices than virtue and talents — the law is the protection of liberty, and juſtice its rule — All perſons have a right to aſſemble peaceably for public worſhip, without any prohibition from particular ſects.—The law does not acknowlege ſervitude or ſlavery; the contract between maſter and ſervant is only an engagement of attention and gratitude, between the man who labours and the man who employs him. Every one has a right to diſpoſe of his property, revenues, labour, and induſtry, according to his pleaſure. Society is obliged to provide for the ſubſiſtence of the unfortunate, either by procuring them work, or maintaining thoſe who are unable to labour. The concluding article ſtates, that when the government violates the rights of the people, inſurrection becomes the duty of the people.

A few days after the publication of this declaration, the aſſembly announced the completion of the new conſtitution of France, which had been diſcuſſed article by article, and paſſed as the conſtitutional act, within the ſpace of a fortnight. It is introduced by the following ſentence---" The French republic honors loyalty, courage, age, filial piety, and misfortune. It puts the depoſit of its conſtitution under the guard of all the virtues." It conſiſts of one hundred and twenty-four articles, arranged under general heads.*

Notwithſtanding the promptitude of the convention in ſatisfying the wiſhes of the people, with reſpect to a conſtitution; ſtill the revolution of the thirty-firſt of May, appeared only to add to the diſtractions which at this fatal period afflicted France, and threatened to proſtrate the genius of the country at the feet of its enemies. Immediately on the decree being paſſed againſt the members of the Gironde, the conteſt between the two parties extended itſelf throughout the departments.

On the ſeventeenth of June the miniſter of juſtice made a report to the convention of the ſteps taken to ſecure the denounced deputies, from which it appeared, that Lanjuinais, Vergniaud, Genſonne, Lehardy, Guadet, Petion, Boileau, Biroteau, Valaze, Gommaire, Bertrand, Gardien, Kervelegan, and Mullevaut, were arreſted at their own houſes.

* See the conſtitution at large, Appendix No. II.

That Bergoing, and Barbaroux had eſcaped after arreſt. That Lidon, Laſource, Rabaut, Briſſot, Salles, Chambon, Gorſas, Grangeneuve, Louvet, Leſage, Vigee, and Lariviere, were either fled or not to be found.

Briſſot and ſome others had fled precipitately to the departments, and ſpread the alarm againſt their opponents. They were not however ſo ſucceſsful in exciting the popular attention as their virtues and republican principles had entitled them to expect. Indeed, however much we may, and moſt ſincerely is their fate to be deplored, a ſentiment pervaded France which was ſuperior to any perſonal conſiderations, it was an attachment to the country againſt foreign force and conſpiracy, and a jealouſy which forbade any adherence to perſons however reſpectable, who were at variance with thoſe who conducted the prominent meaſures of the nation.

Commiſſioners from the triumphant party were ſoon diſpatched into the departments, and the greater number of the fugitives were captured and tranſmitted to Paris; and ſuch was the vigorous activity of the mountain deputies, that congratulatory addreſſes were procured even from the moſt diſtant parts of the country.

The ſouthern departments only remained attached to the fallen party. The city of Lyons in particular, which had from the firſt dawn of the revolution manifeſted a zeal for monarchy and ariſtocracy, and which had on the execution of the king nearly declared for revolt, embraced this new convulſion as a moment favourable to declare its wiſhes and principles. The inſurrection of the thirty-firſt of May was therefore no ſooner announced, than diſcontent was openly manifeſted, Biroteau on his eſcape took refuge in Lyons, where he found the people ripe for revolt, and eager to ſupport the Gironde party. In the beginning of July a congreſs of that department was convoked, and on their meeting at Lyons it was reſolved to march a conſiderable force againſt Paris, to outlaw the mountain party, and to intercept all proviſions deſtined for the camp and the armies. The cities of Marſeilles and Toulon, followed the example of Lyons, and entered into a league for diſſolving the convention, which was from thence ſtigmatiſed with the epithet of federaliſm. The whole department of Gironde alſo, entered warmly into the diſpute, and its members were conſidered as the leaders of the excluded party; the department of Calvados was the retreat of the greater number of theſe fugitives.

On the twelfth of July, the Marſeillois iſſued a manifeſto to the French nation, in which they declare the preſent ſituation of Paris, is equivalent to a declaration of war againſt the whole republic; they denounce Philip Egalite, as the cauſe of all the evils that afflict France, and conjure the people to join their ſtandard to eſtabliſh the republic, wreſt its authority from thoſe who had uſurped it. The Lyonnois were more cautious, in their public declarations, for they profeſſed obedience to the convention, and were vehement in their ſpeeches for the indiviſibility of the republic; while they were at the ſame time levying troops and preparing for a vigorous defence.

The conduct of Lyons and the general ſpirit of revolt in the ſouth, proved to be the moſt fatal circumſtances, for the proſcribed party that could have befallen them; for as the royaliſm of the Lyonnois was univerſally known, and the fanaticiſm of religion was very prevalent in the departments in revolt, it was not difficult to perſuade the people of the other departments, that the Gironde were actually in a conſpiracy with the kings and emigrants. The emigrants had improved the diſturbance to the advancement of their deſigns, and they did not heſitate to declare that a correſpondence ſubſiſted between the Girondiſts and the leaders of the emigrants.

On the eighth of July the committee of public ſafety produced its report concerning the impriſoned members of the convention. It charged Briſſot, Petion, and ſome others, with conſpiring to place the ſon of Lewis on the throne; Carra was charged with propoſing in the Jacobin club, to place the Engliſh duke of York on the throne; Petion was alſo charged with ſigning the order for firing on the people on the tenth of Auguſt; and Manuel of propoſing the ſilly honors uſual to kings, to be conferred on the preſident of the convention; Roland was charged in general terms with perſecuting the republicans; and they endeavoured in like manner to throw the blame of the maſſacres of the ſecond of September on ſome of the accuſed.

It was urged that the Pruſſian general Kalkreuth at the period of the evacuation of Champagne, had made propoſals to general Kellerman for a peace, that they had been tranſmitted to the diplomatic committee, but the Gironde compoſing that body had buried the letters of Kellerman in oblivion. Their connection with Dumourier was reiterated, and even the propoſition of Buzot for baniſhing the Bourbons was declared to be only a contrivance to place the Orleans family out of danger.

Valadi was charged with putting up a bill exhorting the citizens to expel the popular clubs. And the whole were accuſed of exciting rebellion and federaliſm at Bordeaux, Marſeilles, Lyons, the North, and in Corſica; with eſtabliſhing a new ſpecies of tyranny under the commiſſion of twelve, who had impriſoned Hebert a man inveſted with magiſterial authority. On theſe charges all the fugitives were declared traitors, and the ſame accuſations were laid againſt thoſe in cuſtody.

The demon of diſcord had now unlooſed his moſt deadly ſpells. Party had arrived at its moſt deplorable exceſs, and the conduct of the people were no longer under the influence of reaſon or deliberation, but of alarm, ſuſpicion, terror, and enthuſiaſm. The ſuſceptible minds of the fair ſex have ever been peculiarly obnoxious to the influence of enthuſiaſm. A ſtrong example of this, was exhibited at this period by a beautiful young woman, of the department of Calvados, of the name of Charlotte Cordé. She had been in the habits of confidence and friendſhip with many of the fugitive deputies, and her ſpirit was animated with the moſt ſublime devotion to the principles of liberty and her country The factions which prevailed in the convention had excited her abhorrence, and ſhe trembled for liberty and the cauſe of virtue. Among all thoſe who excited her indignation and diſguſt, Marat was the moſt conſpicious and odious. His ſanguinary proſcriptions, his horrid denunciations and maxims, had diſturbed her repoſe, and upon the flight of the Gironde deputies ſhe formed the reſolve to ſacrifice him, to the injured genuis of her country. In the beginning of July ſhe proceeded to Paris from Caen, with letters of recommendation from Barbaroux to Duperret, Fauchet, and others. On the twelfth of that month ſhe addreſſed a letter to Marat—"Your civiſm "muſt make you deſirous of diſcovering conſpiracies; I have a very important one to "communicate to you, and therefore beg you will hear me at your houſe."

As ſhe did not receive an immediate anſwer, ſhe addreſſed a ſecond billet to him,—"Have you received my letter? If you have, I reſt on your politeneſs. It is enough "that I am unfortunate to claim your attention." On the evening of the thirteenth ſhe waited on him, and being admitted, entered into a converſation concerning the conſpiracy which exiſted at Caen and the members in conſpiracy, Barbaroux and others. Marat anſwered that the traitors would ſoon be diſcovered, and would one day loſe their heads on the ſcaffold. He had ſcarcely uttered theſe words, when fired with vengeance ſhe drew a dagger and transfixed it in his heart! — She walked out of the houſe with the moſt perfect compoſure, and was ſoon after arreſted; when brought before a magiſtrate, ſhe looked on them with a ſmile of indignant and contemptuous mockery, and declared that ſhe gloried in releaſing her country from a monſter; that ſhe had fixed her mind upon his death as neceſſary to its ſalvation; that there were others who ſhould alſo periſh had ſhe the power, but as ſhe knew that ſhe could ſacrifice but one, ſhe was determined to begin with the moſt execrable of them all. In her pockets were found a ſmall ſum of money, a letter addreſſed to Marat, a paſſport from Caen, her baptiſmal certificate, dated 28th June 1786.—Duperret and Fauchet to whom ſhe brought letters were put under arreſt, and ſhe was brought before the revolutionary tribunal, and ac-acknowledged the deed. She even ſpoke at large in juſtification of the act, as neceſſary to the honour and happineſs of her country, and glorious to herſelf; that it was due to juſtice to rid the world of a ſanguinary monſter, whoſe doctrines were framed for indiſcriminate deſtruction, and who was already condemned by the public opinion. She truſted her example would inſpire the people with that energy which had been at all times the characteriſtics of republicans, and which ſhe defined to be that devotedneſs to our country, which renders life of little comparitive eſtimation, declaring that ſhe was animated by that ſentiment, in forming her reſolution, that it inſpired her with fortitude and would not deſert her.

MARAT.

Her deportment during the trial was modeſt and dignified. There was ſo engaging a ſoftneſs in her countenance, that it was difficult to conceive how ſhe could have armed herſelf with ſufficient intrepidity to execute the ſacrifice ſhe had reſolved upon, or ſuſtain herſelf with ſo much collection on the verge of death.

She ſometimes ſurprized the audience with her wit, and excited their admiration with her eloquence. Her countenance ſometimes beamed with ſublimity, and was conſtantly covered with ſmiles. Her anſwers to the interrogatories of the court were full of point and energy. At the cloſe of the trial ſhe took three letters from her boſom, and preſented them to the judges, requeſting that they might be forwarded to the perſons to whom they were addreſſed. Two were written to Barbaroux, in which with great eaſe and vivacity, ſhe related her adventures, from her departure from Caen to the morning of her trial. The other was an affectionate and ſolemn adieu to her father and mother, which concluded with the well known verſe of Corneille.—"C'eſt le crime qui fait la honte, et "non pas l'échaffaud."—'Tis the crime makes the ignominy, and not the ſcaffold.

She retired while the jury were deliberating on the verdict, and on her return there was a majeſtic ſolemnity in her demeanour, deeply impreſſive and intereſting. She heard the ſentence with attention and compoſure, and after converſing with her counſel and another friend who ſat near her during the trial, on whom ſhe conferred the requeſt of diſcharging a few ſmall debts incurred at priſon, ſhe left the court with the ſame ſerenity to prepare for the laſt ſcene.

It is difficult to conceive much leſs to deſcribe, the kind of heroiſm which ſhe diſplayed on the way to execution. The croud that aſſembled, uſually ſo clamorous and prone to invective, were awed to ſilence, by her appearance and demeanour, tears flowed even from the eyes of the aged, and thouſands uncovered their heads with reverence and admiration; and even at the place of execution the tokens of reſpect were conſtant; there was ſuch an air of chaſtened exultation thrown over her whole viſage and deportment, that ſhe inſpired ſenſations of love, rather than ſentiments of pity. She aſcended the ſcaffold with undaunted firmneſs, and ſeemed to feel that as ſhe had only to die, ſhe ought to die with a dignity conſiſtent with her patriotiſm. She had learned from the jailor the mode of puniſhment, but was not inſtructed in the detail, and when the executioner attempted to tie her feet to the plank, ſhe reſiſted from an apprehenſion that he meant to inſult her; but upon his explaining himſelf ſhe ſubmitted with a ſmile. When he took off her neck-kerchief, the moment before ſhe bent under the fatal axe, ſhe bluſhed deeply, and her head which was held up to the multitude the inſtant after, exhibited that laſt impreſſion of offended modeſty. In her perſon ſhe was well ſhaped, incilining to tallneſs, of the moſt graceful manners, and modeſt demeanor; there was in her countenance, which was beautiful and engaging, and in all her movements, a mixture of ſoftneſs and dignity. Her ſoul ſeemed to be inſpired with the moſt ardent devotion to liberty and her country, and the heroes of free nations were the frequent ſubjects of her diſcourſe and her admiration; ſhe had introduced herſelf to the notice of the members of the Gironde at Caen, and as appeared, only with a view to become acquainted with men whoſe talents and patriotiſm ſhe admired. She had never communicated her deſign to any of them, which is in itſelf evident from the object which ſhe had ſelected; had their opinions been conſulted, Robeſpierre would have been her victim.

The mountain faction in the convention, was ſtruck with conſternation by her heroiſm, a deputation was ordered to proceed to the lodgings of Marat, and David the painter, one of the deputies thus reports this miſſion:—

"I went with my colleagues into the ſection of the Theatre Françaiſe, in order to put into execution the decree iſſued yeſterday. Putrefaction has rendered the corpſe of Marat ſo infectious, that it will be impoſſible to lay him out in ſtate. Only one half of his body will be preſented to view, covered with a wet ſheet. He is to be interred to night, having been expoſed to the ſight of the friends of liberty in the garden of the Cordeliers, where he formerly entertained and inſtructed them by his leſſons and example.

"I have read," added David, "the lives of the Ariſtides, the Catos, the Fabricii, and the great men of antiquity: all I can do is to admire them, but not to make their panegyric—I am exactly thus ſituated with regard to Marat: I have ſeen him—I have known him—I have conſtantly admired him—Poſterity will be his judge."

Theſe ſentiments of David, and the expreſſions in the ſecond billet of Cordé, leave on the mind an impreſſion, that Marat had obtained at leaſt the reputation of ſome virtues—it is a difficult matter to appreciate his character; by his own party he had been extolled as a martyr of liberty and patriotiſm, as the ſteady and diſintereſted friend of the people; his adverſaries have heaped upon his memory every epithet that is capable of expreſſing turpitude and exciting abhorrence; they have repreſented him as ſelfiſh, corrupt, ambitious, cruel, treacherous, and ferocious; certain it is, that the life of Marat exhibited circumſtances that countenanced all the praiſe of his friends and the cenſure of his enemies; and that in fixing the eſtimate of character, his good actions where they appear, his talents where properly employed, cannot be allowed to extenuate either his errors or his crimes; that as the former alone ſhould have been the rule of his life, ſo the greater his departure from and violation of the obligations of virtue, the more odious and leſs worthy of regard muſt he appear.—In every variety his character exhibits a phœnomenon, which can ſcarcely come into compariſon with any other that has preceded it. By dull yet daring ſyſtems he had attacked the grandeſt diſcoveries of modern times, or of the human mind, his theoretic boldneſs gained him attention, and he endeavoured to accompliſh a revolution in the ſciences; he turned to hiſtory, and his deadly eyes roving over ages ſettled with complacency on the lives of four or five illuſtrious mankillers, who changed cities into deſarts, in order to repeople them with monſters like themſelves—This was all he remembered of the annals of mankind, all he knew, all he in his actions imitated; by an inſtinct reſembling that of beaſts of prey, rather than by any deep or accurate knowledge of man, he ſaw it was poſſible to hurry a people to the extravagance of folly, and to render enormous vice neceſſary to their extrication—he ſaw that the period when a nation burſts aſunder the chains of ſuperſtition and deſpotiſm, was preciſely the point of time to delude them, and his journal, his lectures in the walks of the public gardens, where he affected to rival Socrates and Plato, his harangues to the Jacobins and Cordeliers, were all directed to this end—Yet hear David the painter deplore his death, and if you conſider David as ſincere, which can ſcarcely be doubted, you muſt believe that his private life was in appearance directed to promote virtue by precept and by an examplary diſintereſtedneſs—But view the man and compare his public actions, ſee him buſtling with turbulent activity in the convention, his ſmokey-blood-coloured viſage, his crocodile mouth, and gloting eyes, juſt as if he had iſſued from the den of the anthropophagi, or from hell, with quick, convulſive, broken, interrupted pace, he ſeems to be a condemned aſſaſſin juſt eſcaped out of the hands of the executioner, but whoſe breaſt is ſtill goaded by all the furies—one of thoſe demonized beings, who would annihilate the human race to eſcape their ſight.

Beſide him on the mountain ſat men who could not have contrived deeds like his, they were inſenſibly embarked with him in the headlong ſtream of events whoſe rapid courſe ſtunned and confounded them. They beheld Marat with horror, and their criminately conſiſted in making him who was capable of every deſparate exceſs, the inſtrument to execute meaſures that they would not accompliſh from prudential motives—they ſet him in the midſt of them and wore him as the petrifying Meduſa's hea upon their breaſts; to the mountain they reſorted as to a poſt of military ſervice and danger — and they found themſelves aſſociated with ſuch tygers and wolves as Marat and Robeſpierre, to ſtay was to incur odium, but to deſert was in their minds to relinquiſh liberty to a faction conſpiring for monarchy or oligarchy; they conceived that they could not be diſgraced by the actions of thoſe who violated the principles of liberty, and blindly ſubmitted to obtain imaginary good by the practice of real evil; others looked upon him as the Therſites of the convention, unworthy of reſentment; he was frequently ſaved from the puniſhment which uſually follows perſonal inſult by the contempt which his deformity, his leprous habit, and diminutive perſon excited; he became the habitual retailer of falſehood, and calumny of every kind, and men of reputation would not deign to give his libels conſequence by a perſonal chaſtiſement; even thoſe who employed him, diſclaimed him as a fool, while the general ſentiment that he at length excited was that ſort of antipathy which is felt at the ſight of a loathſome reptile. Unfortunately there are other nations curſed with wretches as unprincipled and deteſtable. We have it on the authority of Necker,* that Robeſpierre dexſtrouſly employed Marat to exaſperate the Girondiſts before the thirty-firſt of May, and engage them in meaſures which would render them unpopular; he liked the extravagancies of Marat, becauſe, in keeping a little below them, his own crimes would eſcape much of their odium. Notwithſtanding the unhappy influence which he obtained, and which he never could have attained in any other poſſible circumſtances, Marat was inconſtant and inconſiſtent in his politics as in his moral profeſſions and practice; for he ſometimes exhorted to the choice of a ſingle chief of the nation, he oppoſed the baniſhment and impriſonment of Orleans, and ſometimes declaimed in favour of a limited monarchy; yet he was at another ſeaſon no leſs clamorous againſt monarchy ſimple or limited, and at length became ſilent on the fate of Orleans.

In a word his talents conſiſted rather of activity than genius—of quickneſs rather than profundity—his morals were a cloak under which he concealed a ſoul ſavage and inexorable—and as altogether it is impoſſible to diſcern in him one paſſion compatible with probity, it is more reaſonable to conſider him as acting under the influence of corruption than of motives inconſiſtent with liberty which he profeſſed to encourage.

Robeſpierre, who anticipated danger in the fate of Marat, and deemed every meaſure good that favoured his purpoſes, ſeized upon his death as a circumſtance peculiarly uſeful to his deſigns—he had him proclaimed as a martyr; but that was only a preluſory act to his major project—it was alſo declared to be the point of conviction of the federaliſm of the departments, and that all together were the reſult of a plot concentred in the accuſed deputies, and iſſuing at all points from them. On the fifteenth of July, Billaud Varennes ſpecified this charge in a long report to the convention, wherein the Girondiſts were accuſed of a correſpondence with the emigrants, and cauſing the revolt of Calvados, Iſere, Finiſterre, Lyons, and Eure.

The royaliſts actually improving upon the diſtractions of faction, had aſſembled in immenſe bodies, and one of which had proceeded on its way to Paris as far as Tours; the Marſeillois eager only for the ſecurity of the republic, reached Avignon on the ſame route; and the combined armies determined to ſtrike in this period of conſternation, for this purpoſe Mentz, was aſſaulted with vigour by the Pruſſians, and finally captured; Alſace was once more overrun by the Auſtrians, Valenciennes was vigorouſly beſieged, and taken; Courtray was ſummoned to ſurrender; the Piedmonteſe made an irruption into Mont-Blanc; the Spaniards inveſted Perpignan; and the Engliſh fleet appeared before Toulon, and opened a treacherous communication which put that place for a while into their hands; to theſe ſeveral tranſactions we ſhall pay particular regard; it may be important, while faction was thus rending the vitals of France, to enquire into the number of powers with which ſhe was actually engaged in hoſtility abroad, which will exhibit a combination, that for extent of dominions, wealth, and power, is without example in the annals of mankind.—1. The emperor, as king of Hungary and Bohemia, 2. The archduke of Auſtria, Brabant, &c. 3. The German empire collectively, 4. The king of Pruſſia, 5. The king of Spain, 6. The king of Great Britain, 7. The king of

* Necker's French revolution, Vol. II. p. 45.

Sardinia, 8. The empreſs of Ruſſia, 9. The duke of Brunſwick Lunenberg, 10. The duke of Deux-Ponts, 11. The prince biſhop of Liege, 12. The Landgrave of Heſſe Caſſel, 13, 14, 15, and 16, The electors of Mentz, Treves, Brandenburg, and Hanover, 17. The States General of Holland, 18, 19, 20, The republics of Hamburg, Lubec, and Bremen; beſide Portugal, Tuſcany and Sicily in ſecret hoſtility, and their colonies in the Weſt-Indies torn by diſſention and ruin more dreadful in comparatively extent even than the mother country.

The powers on the frontiers had converted the ſieges of Conde, Valenciennes, and Mentz, into a blockade. The former had been inveſted early in the month of April, and the works completed on the twenty-ſeventh of that month. But the place not being provided with a ſufficient quantity of proviſions and forage to ſuſtain a long ſiege, general Chancel, who commanded there ordered the women and children to quit the place, but the prince of Wirtemberg compelled them by force to take refuge in the fortreſs again. In a few days after they were ſent out a ſecond time, but the Auſtrian ſoldiers were ſet looſe upon them, and after maſſacring a great number of theſe defenceleſs creatures, even in the act of ſupplicating mercy, the governor moved by humanity once more received them. From this period the garriſon appears to have ſubſiſted under circumſtances of extreme diſtreſs, having been compelled to live principally on horſe-fleſh. About the end of June the beſieged attempted to eſtabliſh a redoubt upon the road to Lacoque, in order to diſlodge the Auſtrians from that place. After an obſtinate reſiſtance, they were forced back into the town, and the work was demoliſhed. From this to the firſt of July, nothing of importance occurred. On that day a negotiation was opened for a capitulation; but the governor conceived it neceſſary to diſpatch a meſſenger to the convention, and another to general Cuſtine, who at this time had aſſumed the command of the northern army; but the terms not proving acceptable, the negotiation was broken off. On the tenth of July the garriſon, after enduring all the rigours of famine, were obliged to ſurrender as priſoners of war. They had originally amounted to four thouſand men, but at the time of the capture were redueed to fifteen hundred, fit for ſervice.

The victory of Famars enabled the allied forces to inveſt cloſely the town of Valenciennes. On the firſt of June general Cuſtine arrived to take the command of the armies of the North and the Ardennes. then encamped at Bouchain; but he found himſelf unable to render any effectual relief to Valenciennes. Above fourteen thouſand men of the beſieging army were employed for the greater part of the ſiege in erecting works and repairing the batteries. During the beginning of June a very briſk fire was kept up from the fortreſs; and on the fifth the French attacked the advanced poſts, but were repulſed.

In the courſe of the ſiege a difference of opinion exiſted between colonel Moncrieffe, the Engliſh engineer, and Ferraris the chief engineer of the emperor. The former was for planting batteries immediately under the walls of the city, inſtead of making regular approaches by parallels; the latter contended that the work of the great Vauban was not to be treated with ſo little reſpect, and his opinion was adopted in the council of war. On the morning of the fourteenth of June the trenches were opened, and the Engliſh commander ſummoned the garriſon, but receiving an unſatisfactory anſwer, the town was cannonaded with great fury, and in the courſe of the night above five hundred red-hot balls were thrown in upon it.

Towards the beginning of July two hundred pieces of heavy artillery played without intermiſſion on the town, and the greater part of it was reduced to aſhes. The number of troops in garriſon was too ſmall to man the batteries which were extenſive, and Ferrand who gallantly ſuſtained the command was from the ſame cauſe prevented from attempting frequent ſallies on the beſiegers. One atttempt was made however on the fifth of July, with great ſucceſs, ſeveral of the beſiegers were killed and the cannon on their works ſpiked.

This ſiege was peculiarly remarkable from the manner in which it was carried on and reſiſted, being moſtly under ground; mines and countermines innumerable having been formed by both parties. The principal mines of the beſiegers were one under the glacis, and another under the hornwork of the fortreſs; both of theſe were completed and charged on the twenty-fifth of July, and in the night, between nine and ten o'clock, were ſprung with the greateſt effect, and the beſiegers immediately ſeized upon the occaſion to make themſelves maſters of the covered way. On the twenty-ſixth the duke of York again ſummoned the place, which after ſome difficulties on the terms, ſurrendered the next day, being taken poſſeſſion of by the duke of York in the name of the emperor of Germany.

During this ſiege, Cuſtine made fruitleſs efforts to relieve the place, but without any other effect than a few ſkirmiſhes between the outpoſts of the armies.

On the ninth of June, an action of a more ſerious nature occurred in the duchy of Luxembourg, between the French under Laage and the Auſtrians under Schroeder, near Arlons, in which the latter were defeated, and compelled to flight with great loſs towards Luxembourg. The Auſtrians in this action occupied an eminence ſtrongly fortified with thirty pieces of cannon, arranged amphitheatrically, as at Gemappe, and defended by eight thouſand men. Theſe were attacked in front and flank at the ſame time, with extraordinary intrepidity, and carried at the point of the bayonet.

From the beginning of April, the king of Pruſſia, had kept Mentz in a ſtate of partial blockade, preparing all the while for a vigorous ſiege; the effect was that the proviſions in the garriſon were exhauſted, and the beſieged were reduced to ſubſiſt upon their horſes. It was, however, found that the delay was not the effect of ſagacity, but of the occupations by which the king was then ſo much engroſſed, the annihilation of the Poliſh government, and the plunder and partition of its provinces. The attack was not therefore commenced till May. On the fourth of that month the king arrived, when his troops had juſt attacked the village of Coſtheim, from which however they did not ſucceed in diſlodging the French. From thence to the beginning of June frequent ſevere ſkirmiſhes took place, without any deciſive action. On the fourth of that month the garriſon made a deſparate ſortie upon the village of Marienborn, which they carried, and ſpiked the Pruſſian artillery; on the ninth they attempted another ſally on all ſides but were every where repelled.

The combined army opened the trenches before Mentz on the nineteenth and twentieth of June. On the morning of the twenty-fourth the garriſon made a ſortie, and ſpiked four pieces of cannon. On the ſame day a large number of women and children were diſmiſſed from the garriſon; but they were fired upon, and the greater part of them butchered by the Pruſſians with unfeeling barbarity: a great number of the women preferring immediate death in any ſhape to the encounter of thoſe civilized ſavages, threw themſelves into the river Mein. On the twenty-fifth another ſortie was attempted by the garriſon, but they were repulſed. On the ſeventh of July the ſtrong works of the French at Coſtheim were carried by the allies, who killed eight hundred of the French and took ſeven pieces of cannon; this ſucceſs was followed on the fifteenth by the blowing up of the laboratory of Mentz, and the deſtruction of a magazine of forage, by the beſiegers. Caſſel, which covered Mentz on the oppoſite ſide of the Rhine, was ſet on fire on the ſeventeenth, and ſeveral ammunition waggons blown up. On the eighteenth the French army of the Rhine made a grand effort to relieve Mentz, by attempting to force their way through, not far from Landau, in an attack at three ſeveral places at once. They were however repulſed by general Wurmſer in every point. This determined the fate of the garriſon, which capitulated on the twenty-ſecond, the principal condition of the articles was, that the garriſon ſhould not ſerve for one year againſt the allies.

On the eighth of Auguſt the French were driven from a ſtrong poſt which they held on the Scheldt, known by the name of Cæſar's camp; the French made no conſiderable reſiſtance on this occaſion, the loſs on both ſides was ſmall.

With theſe actions the ſucceſſes of the allies terminated. The protraction of the ſieges had given time to the French to recover from the diſorganization conſequent of the treachery of Dumourier and the other traitors, and that energy which thinking men from the firſt foreſaw, would finally defeat the abſurd and wicked projects of the allied powers, began once more to revive and diſplay itſelf generally.

After the reduction of Valenciennes, a grand council of war was held, in which a project of the Britiſh miniſtry for the ſeparation of the army, and for an attack on French Flanders was laid before them. The Auſtrian generals pointedly diſapproved of the plan, and ſubmitted two others, either of which they repreſented as more likely to produce conſequences ſuitable to the intereſts of the war. The firſt of theſe was to penetrate to Paris, by the courſe of the rivers which fall into the Seine, on which the heavy ſtores and artillery might be tranſported. The other which was the plan of Cobourg and Clairfait, was to take immediate advantage of the alarm occaſioned by the fall of Valenciennes, and the diſorder in the armies conſequent of the denunciation of Cuſtine, and other generals, and with forty or fifty thouſand light troops, to penetrate to Paris, while a debarkation might be made on the ſide of Brittany to aſſiſt the inſurrection of the royaliſts.

It is evident that none of theſe plans were conſiſtent with true policy. Whatever number of troops had been detached to Paris, would certainly have been cut off, and as to aſſiſting by landing in Britanny there is no reaſon to believe ſuch a meaſure would have been attended with popularity or ſucceſs. That the project againſt Weſt Flanders was ill-conceived the event ſufficiently proved; and the only uſe that could have been profitably made of the circumſtances which encouraged new plans of hoſtility, would have been that of laying a foundation for a peace; but the folly of the allies had not yet filled its meaſure. The preponderating influence of the Engliſh purſe, prevailed in a council held on the twelfth of Auguſt, and the Engliſh, Hanoverians, and Dutch, with ſome Heſſians and Auſtrians, commenced their march for Dunkirk. This expedition was conducted by the duke of York, whoſe reliance was not entirely placed on his own ſkill in tactics nor on the valor of his troops. He had contrived to open a ſecret correſpondence through one of thoſe numerous ſpies employed at that time by England, with governor Omeron, of Dunkirk, and had ſecured as he hoped a free acceſs by means of a golden key. The committee of public ſafety, however, when they ſeized the Engliſh ſpy at Liſle, obtained at once the clue that led to the diſcovery of nearly all his correſpondents, and had ſo contrived as to carry on the correſpondence and develope the treachery of ſeveral officers, among whom was the governor of Dunkirk, who was removed before the arrival of the duke of York, and ſoon after executed for his baſe perfidy.

The deſign was to take, the towns of Berg, Gravelines, and Calais, but firſt Dunkirk: for this purpoſe, on the ſixteenth of Auguſt, the duke of York encamped at Furcoing, where a council of war was held on the ſeventeenth, and on the eighteenth they marched to a camp already marked out at Menin, near which they found the Dutch under the young prince of Orange engaged with the outpoſts of the French, which the former repulſed. The Engliſh troops were brought directly into action, and carried the poſt of Lincelles, though with the utmoſt difficulty and great loſs, and at length found it expedient to deſtroy the works and leave the poſt unoccupied On the twenty-ſecond the duke of York marched from Furnes with a view to attack the French at Ghiveldt, which was abandoned on his approach, and thereby he was enabled to occupy the ground intended for the beſieging camp.

On the twenty-third the duke of York ſent a ſummons by a flag, demanding "the "ſurrender of the place to his Brittanic majeſty," and giving only twenty-four hours to deliberate; the anſwer was laconic— "General,— inveſted with the confidence of the "French republic, I have received your ſummons to ſurrender an important city, I "anſwer by aſſuring you, that I ſhall defend it with the brave republicans I command— "O'Mara."

On the twenty-fourth he attacked the French outpoſts and drove them into the town with ſome loſs. In this affair the famous general Dalton, an Iriſh officer, who ſignalized himſelf under the emperor Joſeph the Second, was killed, with ſome others; and the next day the ſiege commenced. A conſiderable naval armament was to have cooperated in this ſiege, but admiral M'Bride was through ſome neglect in the naval department unable to leave England as early as was expected.

Meanwhile the allies were ſeverely harraſſed by the French, in various points, and their camp particularly, by ſome gunboats haſtily equipped, which kept their ſtation notwithſtanding an Engliſh fleet of one frigate, ſeven cutters, and a galliot, hove in ſight on the twenty-ſixth.

A ſucceſsful ſortie was effected by the garriſon, on the ſixth of September; on the ſame day the covering army of general Freytag, was ſurprized and totally routed, and that general with one of the young Engliſh princes, were captured, but ſoon after reſcued. Theſe diſaſters were indicated for ſome days, by the movements of the French, whoſe force was hourly augmenting; it became neceſſary therefore to raiſe the ſiege on the ſeventh, as the allies had ſuffered very ſeverely in the actions that had taken place.

The French general Houchard was guilty of a groſs breach of duty or negligence on the ſixth, for he might have effectually cut off the retreat of the duke of York, who was ſuffered to eſcape in the cloſe of the action, and ſwam his horſe acroſs a rivulet, never halting till he had got out of hearing of the cannon. Houchard ſuffered death for ſuffering the hopes of the Engliſh royal family to eſcape.

After raiſing the ſiege, the French army took a ſtrong poſition at Maubege, where they were immediately blockaded by the whole force of the allies, under Cobourg.

The armies under this general and Clairfait had been employed in the preceding month of Auguſt, in attempting the ſiege of Cambray, Bouchain, and Queſnoy; at the two former places they were repulſed with loſs; at the latter they were ſucceſsful, as it ſurrendered on the eleventh of September to general Clairfait, a detachment marching for its relief having been repulſed by Cobourg.—They had now turned their attention to the deplorable ſtate of affairs in the army of Dunkirk, expecting to keep the French in check in that quarter.

Jourdan, who was a general of diviſion under Houchard, had now ſucceeded to the command, at the recommendation of the deputies of the convention, who had been witneſſes of his valour and ſkill in the actions prior to, and on the ſixth of September. This general had been bred up in the artillery, and with Hoche and Pichegru, and others who have ſince diſtinguiſhed themſelves at the head of armies in the moſt ſplendid operations of tactics and unſurpaſſed victories, had before the revolution reached the higheſt grade that merit alone could hope for under the old regimen, that of ſerjeants of artillery.

On the fifteenth and ſixteenth of October Jourdan attacked the allies with ſo much ſkill and deciſion, as to compel the prince of Cobourg after ſuffering an immenſe loſs, to abandon a poſition which he had fortified with the utmoſt care for ſeventeen days. So confident was he of its ſtrength, that he ſaid "I own the French are fierce republicans, if "they ſhould drive me hence, I ſhould become one myſelf." The action on both days continued from break of day till night. The Auſtrians paſſed the Sambre on the night of the ſixteenth, leaving ſix thouſand killed and wounded. The French had two hundred killed and twelve hundred wounded. The deputies of the convention, Carnot, Duqueſnoy, and Bar, fought at the head of the columns in theſe actions.

The Auſtrians in their flight committed the moſt horrible devaſtations, revenging their defeat on the inoffenſive villagers, aged, women, and children, and ſetting fire to the villages and hamlets near which they paſſed. The convention, upon the news of this victory, decreed that the ſufferers by the Auſtrian barbarity ſhould be indemnified. Jourdan in the mean time followed up his ſucceſs, and penetrated into maratime Flanders in ſeveral columns at once; he took Werwick and obliged general Erbach to abandon Menin, and retreat to Courtray. On the twenty-ſecond he took Furnes, and proceeded to Nieuport which was ſaved by being inundated. Oſtend was next threatened, but an armament under ſir Charles Grey was ordered to proceed to its relief, and for that time protracted the criſis when the Low Countries were to become a part of France.

On the ſide of the Rhine a number of petty actions took place in which the French were generally ſucceſsful. On the twenty-ſecond of Auguſt general Landremont aſſumed the command at Wieſſembourg, and amuſed the enemy in ſlight ſkirmiſhes from thence to the ſeventh of September, on which day have combined a variety of operations; he ſuddenly attacked the allies at all points, and drove them before him with great ſlaughter; at the poſt of Lauterbourg alone the allies loſt fifteen hundred men. On the eleventh he followed up his ſucceſs by another general attack, in which the allies loſt two thouſand men, including a conſiderable number of emigrants.

The forces of the republic were ſtill more eminently ſucceſsful in repelling the attempts of the rebels in the department of La Vendée.

The country which was the ſcene of this inſurrection in favour of prieſthood and royalty, is ſituated between the Loire and the Charente, ſtretching along the coaſts between the two rivers, and making part of the territory which was called, under the ancient government, the province of Poitou. It is a country fertile both in corn and paſture; and from its rich abundance diſtributed plenty to moſt of the neighbouring departments, and furniſhed even to the centre of France a conſiderable part of its ſupplies; but when ignorance becomes the ſport of fanaticiſm, the ambitious make the cloak of religion the inſtrument of their guilty deſigns, it becomes a calamity the moſt terrible in the liſt of human evils.

The department of the Vendée, from its local ſituation, had little other intercourſe with the reſt of the republic than what aroſe from the export of the ſuperfluity of its produce; and while the great and immortal principles which directed the revolution awakened in the boſom of every mechanic and peaſant throughout France the noble ſentiment that no man was ſuperior to him in his rights, the Vendéan, who had only heard of theſe things through the organ of the noble and the prieſt, remained the implicit believer and obedient vaſſal, while his fellow citizens were rejoicing in their emancipation.

In this inſulated department the feudal ſyſtem had been maintained in all its rigour. The provincial laws of Britanny, which, from the minuteneſs and ſingularity of their oppreſſion, would be rather ſubjects of ridicule than abhorrence, had they not contributed ſo much to the degradation of the human character in the tyrant who inflicted and the ſlave who ſuffered them, were incorporated with other laws equally barbarous, and peculiar to the country.

As this part of the republic, from its geographical and moral ſituation, had received but a few faint rays of the light of that liberty which had burſt forth in France; and as already the ſeeds of diſcord had been plentifully ſcattered among the inhabitants by the fanatical clergy and foreign intrigues, it was fitted to become the retreat of all who were averſe to the new order of public affairs. Accordingly the nobles and the prieſts, who in the firſt meetings of the conſtituent aſſembly, diſcovered, that by the removal of thoſe factitious barriers by which they had hitherto been ſeparated from the other claſſes of the people, they were now to mingle in the common maſs, found refuge in theſe departments, where they truſted that thoſe diſtinctions might ſtill be reſpected which had elſewere ſunk into contempt. Their influence was extenſive; and as their zeal was quickened by implacable reſentment, thoſe laws of which they could not hinder the promulgation, and particularly thoſe which reſpected their own orders, were but imperfectly executed, or apparently obeyed. Having found that that enthuſiaſm which led the conſtituent aſſembly to overthrow theſe gigantic privileges, had conſiderably evaporated towards its cloſe; and ſeeing alſo that the court, in ſtruggling to regain its loſt power, ſought their alliance; they grew bolder in their pretenſions, and became more active in their hatred towards the eſtabliſhment of the new government. At firſt an air of general diſcontent overſpread this part of the country—partial fermentations next ſucceeded, and the ſpirit of inſurrection at length became ſo general, that the conſtituent aſſembly was compelled to take meaſures to ſtop its alarming progreſs.

The means employed by the legiſlature were calculated rather to encreaſe than prevent the evil; for, inſtead of ſending commiſſaries from their own body to examine into its cauſes; inſtead of enlightening the people, and unmaſking and puniſhing thoſe who had prompted them to rebellion; they entruſted the court with the execution of their decrees, and as might have been expected, the inſurrection obtained additional force, and even a ſort of royal ſanction.

The authority of the next aſſembly was inſufficient to repreſs ſo alarming an evil. Too much divided by the ſpirit of party, and too much occupied in ſtruggles againſt the court, the legiſlative aſſembly for a long time applied only palliatives to the diſeaſe; nor, till it wore an aſpect dangerous to the exiſtence of the revolution, was the aſſembly rouſed to the application of any effective remedy. The meaſure they firſt propoſed was the baniſhment of the prieſts who had refuſed adherence to the new conſtitution; but this meaſure appeared ſo alarming to the court, and ſo deſtructive of the ſyſtem it had adopted to regain its loſt influence, that the king was adviſed to make uſe of the repreſſive power which the conſtitution gave him, and to refuſe his royal ſanction. Though this refuſal haſtened the deſtruction of the court, already tottering, it gave new courage to the diſcontented, who, finding themſelves ſo zealouſly ſupported, burſt into open reſiſtance in the Vendée and the neighbouring departments, which it required all the exertions of the departmental force to ſuppreſs.

The fall of the court ſuſpended for a time the progreſs of this inſurrection; but the unhappy auſpices under which the convention met, inſpired freſh ardour, and led the inſurgents to new exertions. In hopes of reſtoring the monarchy, a vaſt plan of inſurrection was formed, which not only comprehended the Vendée and the adjoining departments, but extended itſelf through a great part of Britanny. The convention was too much occupied in reſiſting the conſpirators at Paris to attend to the progreſs of the royaliſts, who were ſuffered to take uninterrupted poſſeſſion of the Vendée and the neighbouring departments. Before the end of March they had organized an army of forty thouſand men, conſiſting chiefly of peaſants, ſervants of the former nobility, ſmugglers, poachers, and game-keepers, men well accuſtomed to the uſe of arms, and had begun their march towards Paris before the convention were formally adviſed that any inſurrection had taken place. Their army was commanded by experienced chiefs who had ſerved under the antient government: but what gave the rebellion its fierceſt rage was the fanaticiſm which the prieſts inſpired, who marching at the head of their columns, bearing the crucifix in their hands, pointed out to their followers the road to victory or heaven. The progreſs which the royaliſts had made before any force was oppoſed to them was ſo alarming, that at the period when the Jacobins had ſeized upon the government at Paris, the portion of the country which the Vendéans had ſubdued was ſo extenſive, that it ſeemed doubtful of which party France was deſtined to be the prey. The royaliſts had entire poſſeſſion of the Loire almoſt as far as Paris, and menanced Rochelle on the one ſide while they beſieged Nantes on the other, and opened a paſſage into the departments which made part of the former province of Britanny.

Upon the arrival of Gaudet and Louvet at Caen on the twenty ſixth of June, they found that on the fifth of that month, eight departments namely three of ancient Normandy, and five of Britanny, had entered into a common league, and had juſt ſent commiſſaries to that city. Felix Wimpfen, who had ſignalized himſelf by his reſiſtance of proferred corruption in the early part of the revolution, and by his gallantry at Thionville, had joined the league, and was appointed commander in chief of the departmental army, as it was denominated. Buzot, Barbaroux, Salles and Petion, were alſo at Caen; and it appears that among theſe deputies various opinions were held on the diſpoſitions and intentions of the general and the force he commanded. He was much beloved by the Normans, and had gained the confidence of the Bretons, but it ſoon appeared that the reception which the preſcribed deputies met, was entirely owing to the charges of royaliſm alledged againſt them in the Paris papers. Wimpfen had been ſummoned to Paris, but he replied, that he could not go without ſixty thouſand men; the deputies, however, confided rather in the former bravery and virtue of Wimpfen than in his preſent conduct, which every day became more ſuſpicious; he had collected about three thouſand men near Evreux, with which he did nothing for three weeks. At Paris however his numbers were from fear on one hand and cunning on the other, magnified to one hundred thouſand.

A ſmall body of about two thouſand men had been ſuddenly raiſed and detached to the neighbourhood of Caen, to be reinforced with additional ſuccours from ſeveral points; theſe had juſt entered Vernon, and then Wimpfen ſet about attacking that town; here it was that Puiſſaye, who became afterwards ſo conſpicuous as the agent of the Britiſh miniſter at Quiberon, appeared firſt in a public character. He was introduced by Wimpfen to Louvet, and the reſt, as an officer of tried ſkill and republicaniſm, and it was to him the attack of Vernon was entruſted, and he appears to have obeyed his private inſtructions with the utmoſt effect.

To ſurprize the enemy he marched in open day with drums beating, and after his ſoldiers had endured the ſcorching heat of the day they had to paſs the night in the open air; the next day he halted within a league of the town, placed his cannon one piece behind the other along a wall, and leaving his army without even the precaution of fixing a centinel, went half a league diſtant to ſleep for the night. A few hours after ſome hundreds of the troops from Vernon appeared, ſeveral ſhots were fired and the army of Puiſſaye left without a general, fled, though not a ſingle man was killed or wounded. This ſerious farce, did not prevent the department of Eure from ſoliciting him to continue with them. Wimpfen on hearing of the affair was not at all diſconcerted; and talked of fortifying Caen.

This conduct alarmed the proſcribed deputies, and Louvet and Salles, ſignified to their colleagues their ſuſpicions, that Wimpfen was treacherous, that he had no inclination to march to Paris, but wiſhed to keep them as the means of his own ſecurity, with the mountain party if they ſhould triumph, or to purchaſe a refuge in England. The greater number of the deputies treated theſe ſuſpicions as viſionary. The general however, requeſted a conference with them all, on an affair of great conſequence; he began by deſcribing their ſituation to be very critical, that he muſt immediately proceed to Liſſeux to organiſe his troops; but that it required ſome meaſures to prepare for exigencies; he then ſuggeſted the creation of paper money, and wiſhed to impreſs the deputies with ideas of apprehenſion—in the midſt of this diſcourſe an officer entered and with great agitation ſignified that a violent commotion had taken place, the convoys for the army were ſtopped, and the deputies were threatened; Wimpfen appeared offended and directed the officer to go and appeaſe the people; he then renewed the converſation, and pointed out the neceſſity of ſpeedy deciſion on meaſures of defence and ſecurity, to provide men, arms, ammunition, money, and help of every kind; "to be "plain," ſaid he, we muſt negotiate with England; and I myſelf have the means provided, "but I muſt have your authority, your engagement."— All the deputies from an emotion of ſpontaneous indignation roſe up, the conference ended, and the deputies ſaw that they had only to provide for their own ſecurity againſt double ruin.

An expedition had been planned by the Engliſh miniſters for the purpoſe of co-operating with thoſe of the revolted departments who had been ſeduced or devoted to royalty; and earl Moira, who had diſtinguiſhed himſelf in the ſanguinary war againſt America, was ſelected to lead the troops deſtined to this ſervice, and to land on the coaſt of Britanny. The ſcheme, however, partook of the general imbecility which had characteriſed all the meaſures of thoſe miniſters. The expedition after an immenſe preparation and expenditure was delayed until the royaliſts were ſubdued, and when the tranſports appeared off the coaſts they found the French ſo well prepared for their reception that they returned, ſatisfied that the French republic was not to be conquered by their force.

The city of Lyons meanwhile ſuffered from the double operation of royaliſt intrigues and the horrible proſcriptions of Robeſpierre's ſatellites. Chalier a Piedmonteſe, was one of that horde of monſters whoſe wickedneſs attracted them from the extremes of Europe round their arch-demon in Paris. He was a ſharper by profeſſion and had fled his native country to eſcape the puniſhment due to his crimes. He was ſent to Lyons ſoon after the meaſures of September, in which he had been an actor, and by ſlow but progreſſive ſteps had excited a very general ſpirit of ſedition, and terror; he propoſed to his confederates the erection of a guillotine on one of the bridges, and the execution of all the opulent men of the city, whoſe bodies were to be thrown into the Rhone. But his ſecret was divulged, and inſtead of meeting that death which he merited, was ſuffered to continue his diabolical projects, and at length he was choſen attorney-general of the commune; on the twenty ſixth of May, while conſpiracy was going forward at Paris he kept pace with it at Lyons, by laying a tax on the rich of ſix millions to be paid in twenty-four hours; on the twenty-ſeventh he publicly declared that the preſidents and ſecretaries of the ſections ſhould be beheaded; ſome tumults enſued, and Chalier and his banditti might have been cruſhed without bloodſhed, had not the narrow ſpirit of commerce, which ſees nothing beneficial in ſociety except the accumulation of wealth, frozen up their ſouls; Lyons even then conſiſted but of thoſe who intended to murder, and thoſe that were to be murdered. A combat enſued in the public ſtreets, and the party of Chalier was diſcomfited after a conflict that laſted from morning to midnight. Chalier and his accomplices were conſigned to a juſt death. But ſore were the afflictions which the vengeance of Robeſpierre and his aſſociates inflicted on Lyons, for the puniſhment of his friend.

General Biron repulſed the army of the inſurgents from Lucon on the twenty-eighth of June; and nearly about the ſame time the city of Nantz was relieved from their incurſions by general Beyſſer, Chatelon was reſcued from them on the third of July by general Weſtermann; but on the following day he was ſurpriſed by the rebels, and compelled to retreat to Parthenay. On Weſtermann's defeat he was ſummoned to Paris to anſwer for his conduct, but was honorably acquitted. The chief command, after this circumſtance, (general Biron having alſo been ordered to Paris) devolved on general Beyſſer, who in ſeveral ſkirmiſhes put the rebels to flight. In the beginning of Auguſt they were again defeated by general Roſſignol; on the tenth of that month however, while the citizens were celebrating the civic feaſt, general Charette, the commander in chief of the inſurgents, vigorouſly aſſailed the city of Nantz, but was repulſed with loſs.

In the mean time blood and devaſtation marked the progreſs of theſe ſoldiers of royalty. Their ceremonies and their diſcipline were a ſtrange compound of ſuperſtition and cruelty; and they even mingled the ſacramental wine with the blood of their adverſaries, and adminiſtered it to the people. One of their ſtandards, which was preſented to the national convention, was white on one ſide, and red on the other; on the red ſide was embroidered the figure of a biſhop in his pontificals; and on the white the virgin Mary with the infant Jeſus in her arms. They gained a conſiderable advantage over the republicans at Parthenay, in the latter end of Auguſt.

On the ſeventh of September general Roſſignol atchieved a ſignal victory over the inſurgents at Pont-de-cé; and in conjunction with Santerre routed them again at Douay. Thouars, and Evreux on the ſucceeding days. In the latter end of September the garriſon of Mentz was ordered to march into La Vendée, and on the ſixth of October the advanced guard vanquiſhed an army of twenty-five thouſand rebels. It would be tedious to enter on a more minute detail of this obſcure and petty war; let it ſuffice to ſay, that the unfortunate inſurgents made a moſt vigorous reſiſtance to every effort of the convention till the middle of October 1793, when they were completely routed. After being driven from La Vendée, they divided into three bodies. The firſt threw themſelves into the iſland of Noirmontier, where they remained for ſome time in a ſtate of blockade, but were at length ſubdued. The ſecond ſeem to have diſperſed; and the third took the route of Anjou, Maine, and Britanny, where they carried on for a while a deſultory warfare, but were at length gradually diſperſed.

The diſaffection of ſome of the other provinces, which immediately followed the revolution, as it is called, of the thirty-firſt of May, was productive of ſtill more ſerious conſequences to the new government.

The department of Calvados had been the firſt in arms, and the formidable force collected in the neighbourhood of Caen, was reported by the mountain to be under the direction of the fugitive deputies, Petion, Buzot, and Barbaroux. In the beginning of July this body of troops, which was called the departmental army, had advanced towards Paris; but the people were evidently not hearty in the cauſe; for, on the approach of the republican army under general Sepper, after a ſlight ſkirmiſh with the advanced guard, they retired again into Calvados; and before the end of the month completely diſperſed, and the department returned to its allegiance. Petion, Buzot, Barbaroux, Salles, Valadi, and Wimpfen, fled; but the majority of them were ſoon after taken, and delivered up to the revolutionary tribunal. Biroteau was executed at Bourdeaux.

The formidable union which took place under the name of 'federate republicaniſm,' between the cities of Marſeilles, Lyons, and Toulon, ſtill however continued, and ſeemed to threaten almoſt the diſſolution of the exiſting authorities. A conſiderable force was diſpatched againſt them under Cartaux in the latter end of July; and in the beginning of Auguſt the Marſellois were driven from the department of Vaucluſe, which they had previouſly occupied. On the twenty-fourth the republicans attacked and took the town of Aix; and immediately upon this ſucceſs the Marſellois opened their gates and ſubmitted. But the people of Toulon and the French vice-admiral Turgoff entered into a negociation with the Engliſh admiral, lord Hood, who was then cruiſing in the Mediterranean, and he took poſſeſſion both of the town and ſhipping in the name of Louis the Seventeenth, and under the expreſs and poſitive ſtipulation that he ſhould aſſiſt in reſtoring the conſtitution of 1789.

In the mean time general Kellerman, who commanded the army of the Alps, was diſpatched againſt Lyons. It contained an immenſe and mixed multitude of the diſcontented citizens of every claſs; ſome royaliſts, ſome of the firſt emigrants, and a conſiderable number of the Gironde party. The city remained in a ſtate of blockade from the eighth of Auguſt; but the firſt attack was reſiſted with great bravery. On the twenty-ſecond and twenty-third of Auguſt the Lyoneſe were computed to have loſt not leſs than two thouſand men, and a great part of the city was reduced to a heap of ruins. In the month of September, as it appeared general Kellerman had not been ſufficiently active, general Doppet, a young officer, who had juſt exchanged the profeſſion of a phyſician for that of a ſoldier, was appointed to the command; and on the eighth of October the city of Lyons ſurrendered to that general. The chiefs of the rebels had fled, but ſeveral of them were afterwards taken and executed. By a ſubſequent decree of the convention, the walls and public buildings of Lyons were ordered to be deſtroyed, and the name of the city itſelf to be changed to that of Ville Affranchie.

On the firſt of Auguſt Barrere produced to the convention a ſeries of papers ſeized upon an Engliſh ſpy, at Liſle; the principal of which was a letter written by an Engliſh under-ſecretary of ſtate in his official character, dated the twenty-ninth of June, wherein the concerns and correſpondence of about ſixty ſpies of both ſexes, placed at various points of the republic, were regulated, new arrangements and appointments notified, precautions ſuggeſted, monies for particular ſervices ſpecified, phoſphoric matches declared to be furniſhed, conflagrations to be performed, money to be plenteouſly employed in corrupting certain perſons named in the letter, belonging to the army and at Paris. With this was a Journal of the tranſactions of the principal of theſe ſpies, of whom a committee was formed at St. Omer, from the twenty-firſt of January to the firſt of July, in which the exact mode of diſtribution of a ſum of about two millions ſterling was minutely ſtated; and from the whole it was clearly proved that not only an immenſe number of the illicit agents of Great Britain had already eſtabliſhed a perfect ſyſtem of correſpondence in France, but that the object was to corrupt as many of the conſtituted authorities as poſſible, and that many had already been bought; and the machinations of the Engliſh miniſter went ſo far as to direct one of the agents to take care that tallow ſhould be ſtored up by foreſtallers, aſſignats refuſed in payment, ſeveral prieſts encouraged to preach againſt the irreligion and deiſm of the republicans, and to encourage religious people men and women to exhort their friends to inſurrection.

A decree was paſſed on the ſame day as follows:

I. The citizens Billaud Varennes and Rivut, repreſentatives of the people in the department of Calais and the North, ſhould be provided with unlimited powers, that all the conſtituted authorities and the armed force ſhould be obliged to obey their orders and comply with their requeſts.

II. The miniſters, adminiſtrative bodies, and municipalities, are eſpecially charged with giving immediately the ſtricteſt orders for the ſevereſt vigilance in all the harbours, arſenals, magazines, and other national eſtabliſhments, and in the public funds.

III. The declaration of Charrier, the Engliſh letter, and the Engliſh notes, contained in the pocket-book left with the committee of public welfare, ſhall be ſent by ſpecial meſſengers to all the departments; as likewiſe the report of the committee of public welfare, of which ſix copies ſhall be delivered to every deputy.

IV. The national convention, in the name of outraged humanity, denounces to all nations, and even to the people of England, the daſtardly, perfidious, and atrocious conduct of the Britiſh miniſtry, who hire murder, poiſon, fire, and all crimes to make tyranny triumph, and to annihilate the rights of man.

V. The property of all perſons who have been and are outlawed by decree, ſhall belong to the republic.

VI. Marie Antoinette is referred to the extraordinary tribunal; ſhe ſhall be inſtantly removed to the priſon of the Conciergerie.

VII. All the individuals of the family of Capet ſhall be tranſported from the territory of the republic; except the two children of Louis Capet, and the individuals of that family which are under the ſword of the law.

VIII. Elizabeth Capet ſhall not be tranſported till after the judgement of Marie Antoinette.

IX. The members of the Capet family, who are under the ſword of the law, ſhall be tranſported after their trial, if found not guilty.

X. The expence of the two children of Louis Capet, ſhall be reduced to what is neceſſary to keep and feed any two individuals.

XI. The tombs and muſoleums of former kings in the church of St. Denis, in the temples, and other places throughout the republic, ſhall be deſtroyed on the next tenth of Auguſt.

A ſeries of decrees was paſſed, chiefly againſt the Engliſh. One of theſe decrees declared every Frenchman a traitor who ſhould place money in the Engliſh funds; and another ordered, that all foreigners, and chiefly the Engliſh, ſhould be put under arreſt. About the ſame period an outrage againſt the law of nations was committed by the Auſtrians, who arreſted citizens Maret and Semonville on a neutral territory, while on their progreſs as ambaſſadors to Naples and Conſtantinople.

In a ſeſſion of the convention on the ſixteenth of Auguſt the energetic and fertile genius of Danton conceived the ſublime project of exhorting the whole people of France to riſe in a maſs to expel the invaders from their territory. The plan was afterwards digeſted by the committee of public ſafety. By this decree, not only the valour of the French nation, but induſtry and the arts were placed in a ſtate of requiſition; and to prevent the evils reſulting from the undiſciplined exertions of a mixed multitude, the new levies were organized with ſingular ability, and central points were eſtabliſhed for their aſſembling. The following is the ſubſtance of the decree which was paſſed on the twenty-third of Auguſt, on the motion of Barrere.

Art. I. From this preſent moment till that when all the enemies ſhall have been driven from the territory of the republic, all Frenchmen ſhall be in permanent readineſs for the ſervice of the armies.

The young men ſhall march to the combat, the married men ſhall forge arms, and tranſport the proviſions; the women ſhall make tents and clothes, and wait in the hoſpitals; the children ſhall make lint of old linen; the old men ſhall cauſe themſelves to be carried to the public ſquares, to excite the courage of the warriors, to preach hatred againſt federaliſm and royalty.

II. The national edifices ſhall be converted into ſtore houſes; the ground of the cellars ſhall be waſhed with ley to extract the ſaltpetre.

III. The muſquets and arms of calibre ſhall be immediately delivered to thoſe who are to march againſt the enemy; the internal ſervice of the republic ſhall be performed with fowling pieces.

IV. All ſaddle-horſes ſhall be given up, to complete the cavalry; the draught horſes and others, except thoſe employed for agriculture, ſhall convey the artillery and proviſions.

V. The committee of public welfare is charged to take all neceſſary meaſures to eſtabliſh, without delay, an extraordinary manufacture of arms of all kinds, ſuitable to the efforts of the French nation. It is authoriſed in conſequence to form all the eſtabliſhments, manufactories, and working-places, which ſhall be deemed neceſſary for the execution of thoſe works; and to ſummon throughout the republic all the artiſts or workmen who can contribute to their ſucceſs. The ſum of thirty millions ſhall be at the diſpoſal of the miniſter at war, to be taken out of the four hundred and twenty-eight millions of livres in aſſignats, which are in reſerve in the cheſt with three keys. The central eſtabliſhment of this extraordinary manufacture ſhall be at Paris.

VI. The repreſentatives of the people ſent into the departments to execute the preſent law, ſhall have the ſame authority, and ſhall concert meaſures with the committee of public welfare; they are inveſted with the unlimited powers attributed to the repreſentatives of the people with the armies.

VII. No Frenchman ſummoned to ſerve, ſhall be ſuffered to ſend a ſubſtitute. The public functionaries ſhall remain on their poſts.

VIII. The riſing or movement ſhall be general: the unmarried or widowed citizens, from the age of eighteenth to twenty-five, ſhall march firſt; they ſhall form, without delay, in the chief place of their diſtrict: they ſhall be daily exerciſed till the day of their departure.

IX. The repreſentatives of the people ſhall regulate the calls and the marches, ſo that the armed citizens may not reach the place of rendezvous before the ſupplies and ammunition and all the mechanical part of the army ſhall have been brought together in a competent proportion.

X. The general points of rendezvous ſhall be determined by the circumſtances, and pointed out by the repreſentatives of the people ſent out to enforce the execution of the preſent law, by advice of the generals, in concert with the committee of public welfare, and the proviſory executive council.

XI. The battalion which ſhall be organized in every diſtrict, ſhall be ranged under a banner with this inſcription—"The French nation riſen againſt tyrants."

XII. The battalions ſhall be organized according to the eſtabliſhed laws, and their pay ſhall be the ſame as that of the battalions now on the frontiers.

XIII. In order to collect a ſufficient quantity of proviſions, the farmers and ſtewards of the national lands ſhall pour into the principal rendezvous of every diſtrict, a ſufficient quantity of corn, the produce of the ſaid lands.

XIV. The proprietors, farmers, and holders of corn, ſhall be obliged to pay their arrears of taxes in the produce of the fields, and alſo two-thirds of the taxes for 1793.

XV. The national convention appoints citizens Chabot, Tallien, Carpentier, Renaud, Dartigoyte, Laplanche of Vievre, Mallarme, Legendre, Carnot, Roux-Fuzillac, Pagenel, Boiſſet, Tallifer, Baile, Pinet, Fayau, Lacroix, and Ingrand, as adjuncts to the repreſentatives of the people who are actually in the armies, and in the departments, in order to execute in conjuction with them the preſent decree.

XVI. The commiſſioners of the primary aſſemblies are invited to repair, without delay, into the departments to fulfil the civic miſſion entruſted to them by the decree of the fourteenth of Auguſt, and to receive the commiſſions which ſhall be aſſigned to them by the repreſentatives of the people.

XVII. The miniſter at war is charged to take all the neceſſary meaſures for the execution of the preſent decree. The ſum of fifty millions ſhall be put at his diſpoſal, to be taken out of the four hundred and fifty-eight millions of aſſignats, in the cheſt with three keys.

XVIII. The preſent decree ſhall be ſent into the departments by extraordinary couriers.

On this decree it is only neceſſary to remark, that had it not been ſeconded by the genius and enthuſiaſm of the people, it muſt have been nugatory and perhaps prejudicial. Arbitrary governments will attempt to copy it in vain; it is the free ſpirit of the people alone that can give effect to ſuch grand and daring projects, though the genius of the ruling power may certainly direct and regulate the energy on which ultimately ſucceſs may depend.

Happy had it been for France had the dignity of her great meaſures, the unanimity of her heroic citizens, and the vigor and ſublimity of her defenſive projects, not been clouded by the dark ſchemes and profligacy of ambitious and treacherous men, who abuſed her power and the generous and unſuſpicious magnanimity of her people, to the moſt ſanguinary and deadly purpoſes. That the frequency of intrigues, the treachery of many of their commanders, and the ſecret workings of the agents of foreign powers had excited and in a degree juſtified ſuſpicion and vengeance is unhappily too true, and it muſt be acknowledged, although humanity will ever lament it, that many not only innocent but meritorious individuals ſuffered. Among the victims of popular reſentment which fell about this period, the celebrated general Cuſtine, whoſe former ſervices, merited every reſpectful regard, became a victim to the boundleſs effects of jealouſy and conſpiracy. He was called to Paris from the command of the northern army in the begining of July, and on the eighteenth arrived in that capital. On the twenty-eighth he was committed to the Abbaye priſon, and in the begining of Auguſt brought before the revolutionary tribunal. The charges againſt him were, that he maintained a ſecret correſpondence with the enemy—that he had left the garriſon of Mentz unprovided with neceſſaries, in conſequence which numbers had periſhed of famine, the whole underwent great misery, and were at length compelled to capitulate—that there existed a letter signed Custine, in which he engaged d'Oyse, commandant of Mentz to deliver up the place to the Prussians—that he had insulted the national representation by disobeying its orders, and by asserting publicly in letters to the minister that "such decrees as he did not approve only served him for papers to curl his hair,"—finally that he had not exerted himself properly to prevent Valenciennes from falling into the hands of the enemy. Custine on his trial affirmed that the charge concerning the letter to d'Oyse was an utter falshood, and the rest he endeavoured to shew were not grounded upon fact; however, the unfortunate general was led to the scaffold, lamenting in his adversity the desertion of his former friends, asserting his innocence, and praying for the happiness of his country to the last moments of his life.

The trial of the queen immediately followed that of Custine; it was provoked at this time by a plan that had been laid to carry her off by force from the Temple, during the first tumult that should occur, and the discovery that a number of strangers had recently arrived at Paris suspected to be for the purpose; one of these had contrived to gain access to her prison, and to notify the design to her:—several other motives were assigned.

On the night between the first and second of August two municipal officers repaired to the tower of the Temple, and a little before midnight announced the decree which ordered her removal to the Conciergerie.—She was in bed—"must I rise," she asked. The officers answered in the affirmative; she then desired they would withdraw, that she might dress herself, and they did so; when dressed they notified their orders to search her, she delivered to them twenty-five Louis d'Ors, and a pocket book, but used repeated entreaties to be suffered to keep the book, or for them to seal it up and take a protocol of its contents. After some time, she recognized one of the officers as the same who had on the preceding year notified the removal of the princess de Lamballe from her, "sir, the separation which you announced to me a year ago was very painful; but I find the present not less melancholy." She then desired to take some clothes, "I could wish," said she, "not to be left in foul linen as I was last year in the house of the Feuillans." she then made up a few changes in a parcel; three shifts, a few caps, a black silk jacket and a coat.

She then desired to have an interview with her daughter and madame Elizabeth. This was permitted, after some hesitation. Madame Elizabeth stepped first into the apartment, melting in tears, bordering on a state of despair, and almost deprived of her senses. They locked each other fast in their arms.

Her majesty preserved the most unshaken fortitude in this trying scene.

When her daughter appeared, she said, "My daughter! thou knowest thy religion; thou oughtest to have recourse to its solace in every situation of life."

The queen then desired to see her son; but her demand was refused: the officers told her, "Your son is innocent and he will not be hurt."

She then took the parcel containing her linen under her arm, descended the stairs, and found a fiacre, or hackney coach, waiting for her in the court-yard. When getting into the carriage, one of the officers offered to help her; but she gently pushed back his hand, telling him that she wanted no assistance.

The queen was dreſſed in white lawn, and wore a black girdle. She was conducted to the priſon through a narrow paſſage, very badly lighted, in which the ſudden barking of two maſtiffs threw her into convulſions.

The officers were then obliged to carry her to the priſon in their arms; and being arrived there, ſhe continued ſo very ill, that, for one hour, her life was threatened with inſtant diſſolution. She recovered, however, in the morning.

She was confined in the Conciergerie, where ſhe remained to the fourteenth of October when ſhe was brought before the jury of the revolutionary tribunal, and underwent an examination on the ſeveral charges; Chaveau and Tronchon-Ducoudray were appointed her counſel, and on the fifteenth ſhe was brought to trial, and arraigned of a ſeries of crimes, which in the language of the indictment comprehended not merely counter-revolutionary projects, but all the enormities and vices of the Meſſalinas, Brunehauts, Fredegundes, and Medecis.

The act proceeds to ſtate, That ſhe communicated to the enemy plans of the campaign, and other intelligence—That the affair of the tenth of Auguſt was the conſequence of a horrible conſpiracy againſt the nation formed by her intrigues; and that, to promote her views, ſhe kept the Swiſs guards in a ſtate of intoxication—That on that day ſhe preſented the king with a piſtol, ſaying, "This is the moment to ſhew yourſelf;" and on his refuſing, called him coward—That ſhe was alſo a principal agent in the internal war with which France was then diſtreſſed.

The laſt charge was the moſt infamous and moſt incredible, it was as follows:—"That finally the widow Capet in every reſpect immoral, and a new Agrippina, is ſo diſſolute and ſo familiar with all crimes, that forgetting her quality of mother, and the limits preſcribed by the law of nature, has not heſitated to proſtitute herſelf to Charles Louis Capet, her ſon; and according to the confeſſion of the latter, ſhe has committed indecencies with him, the very name of which ſtrikes the ſoul with horror."

There were above fifty witneſſes examined on various points, a maid-ſervant gave in evidence a converſation which ſhe had formerly held with the duke of Coigny, in which he complained of the immenſe ſums privately remitted by the queen to her brother during his war with the Turks; and ſome papers were referred to, from which it appeared that the queen had drawn for money on the treaſury ſince the revolution.

The charge concerning her favouring the anti-patriotic ſentiments of the body-guards at Verſailles on the firſt of October, was better ſupported, and we think on the whole, was proved; as well as her activity in promoting the flight of the royal family to Varennes.

It appeared alſo that ſhe had frequently been conſulted by the king upon political ſubjects; that ſhe had recommended ſome perſons to brevets in the gardes-du-corps:—that ſhe treated her ſon with regal reſpect was alſo proved. But the horrid charge of inceſt was made upon the authority merely of ſome indiſtinct communications from the boy Capet to the mayor of Paris, and was certified as follows, by Hebert, deputy-attorney of the commune; "that young Capet whoſe conſtitution became every day impaired, was ſurpriſed by Simon in practices deſtructive to his health, and at his period of life very uncommon; upon being aſked who inſtructed him in theſe practices, he replied, that it was his mother and aunt; and from his declaration in the preſence of the mayor and attorney of the commune it appeared, that theſe two women had often made him ſleep between them and had been accuſtomed to the moſt abominable indulgencies!"

In anſwering to the interrogatories, upon the various queſtions, ſhe paſſed over that on the laſt charge in ſilence, the tribunal was proceeding to hear another witneſs, when one of the jury deſired an anſwer from the accuſed on that charge—She collected herſelf with an air of proud indignation, and ſaid—"I remained ſilent on that ſubject, becauſe "nature holds all ſuch crimes in abhorrence,"—then turning to the auditory with animation exclaimed—"I appeal to all mothers who are preſent in this auditory, if ſuch "a crime is poſſible!"

A curious account of the evidence in ſupport of theſe charges, and the effect which her behaviour produced upon Robeſpierre, is given by Vilate, a young man of the revolutionary tribunal, The ſcene paſſed during the trial, at a tavern near the Thuilleries, where he was invited to dine with Robeſpierre, Barrere, and St. Juſt. "Seated around the table," he ſays, "in a cloſe and retired room, they aſked me to give them ſome leading features on the trial of the Auſtrian. I did not forget that expoſtulation of inſulted nature when, Hebert accuſing Antoinette of having committed the moſt ſhocking crime, ſhe turned with dignity towards the audience, and ſaid, "I appeal to the conſcience and feelings of every mother preſent, to declare if there be one amongſt them who does not ſhudder at the idea of ſuch horrors." Robeſpierre, ſtruck with this anſwer as by an electrical ſtroke, broke his plate with his fork. "That blockhead Hebert!" cried he, "as if it were not enough that ſhe was really a Meſſalina, he muſt make her an Agrip-"pina alſo, and furniſh her with the triumph of exciting the ſympathy of the public in "her laſt moments."

After the evidence had been gone through, Fouquier the public accuſer, ſubmitted to the jury the following queſtions:—

I. Is it proved, that there exiſted machinations and private intelligences with powerful foreign ſtates, and other external enemies of the republic; ſuch machinations and intelligences tending to furniſh ſuccours in money, and to give them ingreſs into the French territory, for the purpoſe of facilitating the progreſs of their arms?

II. Marie Antoinette, is ſhe convicted of having cooperated with thoſe machinations, and of having entertained thoſe intelligences?

III. Is it proved that there exiſted a plot or conſpiracy to light up a civil war in the heart of the republic?

IV. Marie Antoinette, is ſhe convicted of having had a ſhare in that plot and that conſpiracy?

The jury after having deliberated about an hour, returned into the hall, and gave a verdict, affirming all the queſtions ſubmitted to them.

The preſident then addreſſed the following ſpeech to the people:—

"If the citizens who compoſe the audience were not liberal men, and of conſequence capable of feeling all the dignity of their ſtate, I ought, perhaps, to recal to their memory that at the moment when the national juſtice is about to declare the law, reaſon and morality impoſe upon them the greateſt ſilence, and forbid every mark of approbation; and that a perſon, of whatever crimes they may be convicted, and attainted by the law, is then only entitled to pity and humanity."

The queen was again brought in.—

Preſident—"Antoinette, hear the verdict of the jury;" which was then read. "You ſhall hear the queſtions of the public accuſer."

Fouquier then ſpoke, and demanded that the accuſed ſhould be condemned to die, conformable to the firſt article of the firſt ſection of the firſt head of the ſecond part of the penal code, which is thus expreſſed:

"Every manœuvre or intelligence with the enemies of France, tending to facilitate their entrance into any part of the empire, whether it be to deliver up to them towns, fortreſſes, ports, or veſſels, appertaining to France, or with furniſhing them with ſuccours in men, money, proviſions, or ammunition, or to favour in any manner the progreſs of their arms on the French territory, or againſt our forces by ſea or land, whether by corrupting the fidelity of the officers, ſoldiers, or other citizens, towards the French nation, ſhall be puniſhed with death."

And the ſecond article of the firſt ſection of the firſt head of the ſecond part of the ſame code is thus expreſſed:

"Every conſpiracy and plot, tending to trouble the ſtate by a civil war, in arming citizens againſt citizens, or againſt one another, or the exerciſe of regal authority, ſhall be puniſhed with death."

The preſident called upon the accuſed to declare, whether ſhe had any objection to make to the ſentence of the laws demanded by the public accuſer.

Antoinette bowed her head, in token of negative.

Upon the ſame demand being made of her defenders, Tronchon ſpoke, and ſaid, "Citizen preſident, the declaration of the jury being preciſe, and the law formal in this reſpect, I announce, that my profeſſional duty with regard to the widow Capet is terminated."

The preſident gathered the ſuffrages of his colleagues, and pronounced the following ſentence:

"The tribunal, after the unanimous declaration of the jury, in conformity to the laws cited, condemns the ſaid Marie Antoinette, called of Lorraine and Auſtria, widow of Louis Capet, to the penalty of death, her goods confiſcated for the benefit of the republic; and this ſentence ſhall be executed in the Place of the Revolution."

Marie Antoinette, during the whole of her trial, preſerved a calm and ſteady countenance.—During the firſt hours of her trial, ſhe played with her fingers upon the bar of the chair with an appearance of unconcern, and it ſeemed as if ſhe was playing on the forte-piano.

When ſhe heard her ſentence read, ſhe did not ſhew the ſmalleſt alteration in her countenance, and left the hall without ſaying a ſingle word to the judges or to the people. It was then half paſt four o'clock in the morning, October the ſixteenth; but her firmneſs forſook her on the way from the court to her dungeon—ſhe burſt into tears, and as if aſhamed of her weakneſs ſhe obſerved, that though ſhe wept then, ſhe ſhould go to the ſcaffold with compoſure.

At five o'clock the general was beat. At ſeven, the whole armed force was on foot; cannon were planted upon the ſquares, and at the extremities of the bridges, from the palace to the Square de la Revolution. At ten o'clock, numerous patroles paſſed through the ſtreets. At half paſt eleven o'clock in the morning; Marie Antoinette was brought out of the priſon, dreſſed in a white diſhabille. Like other malefactors, ſhe was conducted to the place of execution. Her hair from behind was entirely cut off, and her hands were tied behind her back. Beſides her diſhabille, ſhe wore a very ſmall white cap. Her back was turned to the horſe. During her trial, ſhe wore a dreſs of a black and white mixture. On her right was ſeated the executioner; upon the left a conſtitutional prieſt, belonging to the metropolitan church of Notre-Dame, She was eſcorted by numerous detachments of horſe and foot. Henriot, Ronſin, and Boulanger, generals of the revolutinary army, preceded by the reſt of their ſtaff-officers, rode before.

QUEEN of FRANCE.

An immenſe number of people crowded the ſtreets, and cried "Vive la Republique, "à bas la Tyrannie!" She ſeldom caſt her eyes upon the populace, and beheld with indifference the great armed force of thirty thouſand men, which lined the ſtreets in double ranks.

Her eyes though bent on vacancy, did not conceal the emotion that was labouring at her heart—her cheeks were ſometimes in a ſingular manner ſtreaked with red, and ſometimes overſpread with deadly paleneſs; but her general look was that of indignant ſorrow. She reached the place of execution about noon; and when ſhe turned her eyes towards the gardens and the palace, ſhe became viſibly agitated. She aſcended the ſcaffold with precipitation, and her head was in a moment held up to the people by the executioner.

Marie Antoinette was the eighth daughter of the emperor Francis the Firſt and the celebrated Maria Thereſa. She was born at Vienna, the ſecond of November, 1755, and married on the ſixteenth of May, 1770. Her character has been pourtrayed in colours the moſt oppoſite, but even her warmeſt advocates have admitted that the habits of her life were no more than what was cuſtomary at court, and if they were vices that they were not hers. Unqueſtionably it would be inequitable to judge her political conduct prior to the revolution, by the rules of ordinary juſtice, or the maxims of equality that ſuperceded her greatneſs and her influence; her intrigues in politics were no more than had been practiſed for ſeveral ages; and if it muſt be acknowledged that the court in which ſhe preſided was the moſt corrupt and intriguing in the world, it muſt alſo be admitted to have been in a great degree ariſing from the neceſſary nature of abuſe, which never recedes but always progreſſes and extends its ſurface. It is to her moral conduct the moſt ſerious charges have been laid; againſt this ſerious object of accuſation, no other than a general anſwer has ever been given, unleſs in that heinous article which the infamous Hebert laid to her charge—of which the voice of humanity and candour has acquitted her; but her acquittal of this, nor that warning which her death has furniſhed to perſons placed in power, have not obliterated the looſeneſs of her habits, and the licentious debauchery which ſhe patronized while in the giddy career of uncontrolled power. Her memoirs written by Morand, the criminations expoſed by the Scotch fanatic lord George Gordon, which occaſioned his impriſonment and death, and the memorable tranſactions of the Necklace, with the Cardinal de Rohan and the counteſs de la Motte, can never be eraſed from her hiſtory, whatever may be the ſentiments of compaſſion and commiſſeration, excited by her perſonal ſufferings, and unhappy fate.

Amidſt the ſerious functions of legiſlation, war, and judicial proſecution, the convention had employed a committee to regulate and correct the exiſting mode of computing time, and to adjuſt the meaſures of it, and the deſignation of periods, upon principles more coherent and ſignificant, than in the calendar generally received in the nations of Europe. The irregularity of the number of days in the months was to be corrected, and names more expreſſive of the ſeaſons adopted; the hebdomadal diſtribution of the month was to be altered into a decadary arrangement, and the months to conſiſt of three equal portions of days, each decade named numerically, leaving the ſurplus of days of the ſolar year, to form a ſupplementary period at the cloſe of each. To the members of the committee of public inſtruction who had charge of this operation, a painter and two poets were added, Fabre d'Eglantine, Chenier, and David, in order that the calender might unite taſte with philoſophy, and on the fifth of October the following decree was preſented as the baſis of the republican Calendar.

I. The French æra commences from the foundation of the republic, which took place on the twenty-ſecond of September 1792, of the vulgar æra, the day at which the ſun arrived at the true autumnal equinox, entering the ſign of the balance, nine hours eighteen minutes thirty ſeconds A. M. for the obſervatory of Paris.

II. The vulgar æra is aboliſhed for civil purpoſes.

III. The commencement of each year is fixed at midnight, the commencement of the day in which falls the true autumnal equinox for the obſervatory of Paris.

IV. The firſt year of the French republic commenced at midnight, September twenty-ſecond, 1792, and ended at night between the twenty-firſt and twenty-ſecond of September, 1793.

V. The decree which fixed the commencement of the ſecond year on the firſt of January 1792 is repealed. All the acts dated the ſecond year of the republic, from the firſt of January to the twenty-ſecond of September 1793, are to be conſidered as belonging to the firſt year of the republic.

VI. The year is divided into twelve equal months of thirty days each, after which five ſupplementary days are to be added to complete the three hundred and ſixty-five days of the ordinary year. Theſe five days do not belong to any month.

VII. Each month is divided into three decades of ten days each. They ſhall be diſtinguiſhed into firſt, ſecond, and third.

VIII. The twelve months, the five ſupplementary days, and the ten days of the decade, ſhall be named ordinally—the firſt, ſecond, third month, &c. the firſt, ſecond, third ſupplementary day; the firſt, ſecond, third day of the firſt, ſecond, third decade. Nevertheleſs, when ſpeaking of a very late period, we may ſay the fifteenth or twentieth day of the firſt, ſecond or third month of the year, &c.

IX. The years which ſhall receive an intercalary day as the poſition of the equinox ſhall require, now called Biſſextile, or Emboliſmic, are named Olympic. The period of four years, ending with an Olympic year, is called an Olympiade.

X. The intercalary day of the Olympic year ſhall always be placed after the five ſupplementary days; it ſhall be called the day of the revolution.

XI. The day from midnight to midnight is divided into ten parts, each part into ten others, and ſo on to the leaſt meaſurable portion of time. This article ſhall not be compulſory for public acts till the firſt day of the third year of the republic.

XII. The committee of public inſtruction is charged to cauſe the new Calendar to be printed in different forms, with a ſimple inſtruction to explain its moſt familiar principles and uſes.

XIII. The new Calendar ſhall be ſent to all the municipalities, adminiſtrative bodies, tribunals, juſtices of the peace, notaries, profeſſors, popular ſocieties, and to the armies.

XIV. The minutes of the convention, the acts of the executive council, thoſe of the adminiſtrative bodies, of the tribunals, and all public acts, ſhall be dated in future according to the new Calendar of the republic.

XV. All profeſſors, teachers, fathers and mothers of families, and all perſons employed in the education of children, ſhall explain to them the new Calendar, according to the printed inſtruction.

XVI. Every four years, on the day of the revolution, civic games ſhall be celebrated in commemoration of the French revolution.

XVII. The ſecond year of the republic commenced, according to the old Calendar, on the twenty-ſecond of September 1793, at midnight, the true autumnal equinox falling, for the obſervatory of Paris, three hours, ſeven minutes, nineteen ſeconds, A. M.

NEW FRENCH CALENDAR.

FOR THE YEAR, 1793, COMMENCING SEPTEMBER THE TWENTY-SECOND.

	French Names.	Engliſh.	Term.	Duration.
AUTUMN.	Vindemiaire	Vintage Month	from Sept. 22 to Oct. 21 incl.	30 days.
	Brumaire	Fog Month	Oct. 22 to Nov. 20	30
	Frimaire	Sleet Month	Nov. 21 to Dec. 29	30
WINTER.	Nivos	Snow Month	Dec. 21 to Jan. 19	30
	Pluvios	Rain Month	Jan. 20 to Feb. 18	30
	Ventos	Wind Month	Feb. 19 to Mar. 20	30
SPRING.	Germinal	Sprouts Month	Mar. 21 to April 19	30
	Floreal	Flowers Month	April 20 to May 19	30
	Priaireal	Paſture Month	May 20 to June 18	30
SUMMER.	Meſſidor	Harveſt Month	June 19 to July 18	30
	Thermidor	Hot Month	July 19 to Aug. 17	30
	Fructidor	Fruit Month	Aug. 18 to Sept. 16	30
				360 days.

SANS CULOTTIDES,* OR FEASTS DEDICATED TO.

Les Virtus	The Virtues	September 17	1
Le Genie	Genius	September 18	1
Le Travail	Labour	September 19	1
L'Opinion	Opinion	September 20	1
Les recompenſes	Rewards	September 21	1
			365

* Thls denomination was changed at a ſubſequent period, when the name of Sanſculotte was aſſumed by every ruffian and aſſaſſin. The ſimple ſignification of "ſans culotte," is "without breeches;" the queen had applied it as a ſarcaſm on the repreſentatives of the people; implying that fellows without breeches had become the governors; thenceforward it was adopted as a title of pride by the republicans,

The intercalary day of every fourth year is to be called LA SANS CULOTTIDE, on which there is to be a national renovation of their oath, to live free or die.

The month is to be divided into three Decades, the days of which are called, from the Latin numerals,—

1. Primdi
2. Duodi
3. Tridi
4. Quartidi
5. Quintidi
6. Sextidi
7. Septidi
8. Octodi
9. Nonodi, and
10. Decadi, which is to be the day of reſt.

On the eighth of October, Delaunay of Angers made a report of two hours length on the New India-Company created by Calonne. The report drew a moſt hideous portrait of the ci-devant miniſter of finance, and ſhewed how corrupted the old ſyſtem of government muſt have been which employed as its principal agents ſuch characters as Calonne. The new company which he created afforded the moſt indubitable evidence of the wickedneſs of that miniſter, who had only been rendered illuſtrious by his crimes. The company, according to the report, was creditor of the nation for more than fifty millions, while the proprietors of ſtock had been ruined by the brokers Lecouteaux, d'Eſpagnac, and others. Delaunay propoſed the plan of a decree, of which the following are the heads :—

I. The India company is ſuppreſſed. No trading company, no merchant, ſhall henceforth take the name of India-Company.

II. The adminiſtrators of the India-Company, ſhall give in their accounts to the nation.

III. They ſhall immediately reimburſe the ſums for which they are indebted to the public treaſury.

IV. All the ſhips and magazines of the India-Company ſhall be ſequeſtrated, and committed to the diſpoſal of the miniſter of marine.

On the ſeventeenth of October, the national commiſſioners at Nice notified that the "little deſpot of Naples," had declared war againſt the republic.

A report had been preſented to the convention on the thirtieth of September, containing an expoſition of ſtockjobbing, and the machinations of the Engliſh government to promote it, in order to create diſtreſſes and deſtroy the reſources of the republic, forty Engliſhmen, among whom was a major-general, were ſeized at Abbeville and its neighbourhood, and a vaſt quantity of forged aſſignats found upon them, together with a correſpondence with ſeveral brokers in various cities of France; meaſures were at once determined upon againſt the brokers, and the confiſcation of all property of whatever deſcription belonging to the Engliſh ſubjects. The hatred of the convention was alſo excited by advices from Toulon, by a letter from P. A. Adet, to the miniſter of marine, dated September the twenty-ſeventh, he reported that two of the national repreſentatives had been put to death by the Engliſh, who had inſtituted a revolutionary tribunal, compoſed of Engliſh and Spaniſh officers, by whoſe ſentence Beauvais-Preau formerly mayor of Toulon, and then a repreſentative, was publicly hanged; Pierre Bayle another repreſentative was privately ſtrangled in a priſon for ſteadily declaring his attachment to the republic.

Delaunny of Angers, in the name of the three committees of commerce, public safety, finances, and the commiſſion of five,—

Citizens—You have charged us to examine the decree of the ſeventh of September, and the petition which was preſented to you for the confiſcation of all property lodged in France belonging to nations at war with the republic; in all their motives and through all their conſequences. Little meditation was neceſſary, to convince your united committees that this queſtion was connected with the general movement, the moſt powerful intereſts, the revolution and liberty.

The petitioners have taken part in our diſcuſſions. All circumſtances have been weighed, conſulted, and maturely meditated. Diverging opinions have been analyzed and I am commiſſioned to preſent you with the reſult.

My preſent buſineſs is to lay before you objections, and their anſwers; doubts, and the motives of deciſion. Nothing can be more reſpectable than the intentions of thoſe who have adviſed the univerſal confiſcation of all property whatever in France, appertaining to foreigners, whoſe government is at war with us. The object has been to deprive our enemies of every reſource, which their induſtry or their intrigues may have drawn from France to employ againſt herſelf; the end is deſirable, ought to be attained, and is attainable; but whether attainable or not by the plan of confiſcation, as propoſed to you, is the queſtion. We have been told, in the convention, in the petition, and in our diſcuſſions, that our commerce, by its nature and preſent ſituation, is debtor to foreign powers in large ſums, which it is propoſed to confiſcate for the benefit of the republic.

Your committees, Citizens, among the motives which lead to favour or to reject this propoſition, have omitted to take one into conſideration, which is not, however, without its weight: namely, that commercial debts are not the conſequence of any treaty between government and government, but tranſactions merely between individual and individual. Hence there appears to be an indubitable immorality in confiſcation, abſolutely contrary to the principles that have been moſt ſolemnly conſecrated by our revolution; for it would be to injure the faith due from man to man, and the univerſal probity of which we have publiſhed the eternal code. We have, however, laid theſe political obſervations aſide, that we might examine the propoſed confiſcation in that ſenſe only under which it has been preſented; that is with relation to its poſitive utility. Hence we have aſſumed as a principle that, in a ſtate of war, eſpecially in a ſtate of revolution, whatever is noxious to the enemy, and contributes to the ſafety of the nation, is neceſſarily juſt and lawful. In this point of view confiſcation preſents under the aſpect of the natural right of repriſal, in which caſe it may be ſaid that there is only an account to ſettle.

It is ſuppoſed in the ſyſtem of confiſcation, that the commerce of France is more extenſive than the individual commerce of England. This principal argument of the petitioners, in our diſcuſſions, was aſſumed by them on the ground that population is in France three times as great as it is in England. Therefore, ſay they, the wants of twenty-five millions of individuals being ſuperior to thoſe of eight millions, the debt reſulting from the exchange of wants muſt be againſt us, to the profit of ourſelves, and in the ratio of the comparative population. You will eaſily perceive, citizens, that this argument is inimical to the ſyſtem of confiſcation; for, if we are to decide by the relative population, we muſt compare our own number with thoſe of our enemies. In a general queſtion, we muſt not ſingle out the Engliſh; we muſt include all the nations with whom we are at war; and this, according to the arguments of the petitioners, confiſcation, by way of repriſal, will be greatly to our loſs; ſince the loſs will be in proportion to the inferiority of our population compared to the whole of our enemies united. But this argument itſelf is merely an aſſumption, Your committes have commiſſioned me only to ſtate it to you, becauſe of its deceptive nature, when ſeverally applied to the powers with which we are at war; the deluſion vaniſhes when the general balance between our population and that of our enemies, is ſtated. In fine, your committees, after having laid aſide mere hypothetical theories as inextricable labyrinths, have elſewhere ſought thoſe real documents which calculation and experiment afford.

We therefore begin by ſubmitting to you the general ſtate of our individual commerce and the balance it bears to that of England and Holland, eſtimating the relative debt according to the beſt atteſted facts. No perſon certainly will deny, that the Engliſh have ſecured to themſelves the chief trade of Europe, by aſſiduouſly and inceſſantly ſupplying the wants of all nations. This proof is unanſwerable. The Engliſh government annually draws from commercial induſtry, a public revenue of more than three hundred millions; they thus artifically, but wonderfully, raiſe themſelves to one of the firſt powers of the world. Reduced to its population and the ſimple productions of its ſoil, England would politically rank itſelf among the inferior nations of Europe.

But, how is it that England maintains this extenſive commerce? By every where obtaining an immenſe credit; by bills of exchange at ſtated terms; and, in a word, by long remaining debtor to every other people.

The man muſt be entirely ignorant of the practical elements of commerce, and the circulation of credit throughout Europe, who ſhould conteſt this fact, or deceive himſelf concerning the ſtanding debt of the Engliſh to all Europe. This enormous debt is a contribution levied by them on every other nation.

We ſhall now paſs from this general view of the commercial ſyſtem and profound policy of the Engliſh, and examine their particular ſituation with reſpect to France, that we may the better judge of the certain effects of confiſcation.

Our firſt queſtion will be, What have the Engliſh done ſince the commencement of the revolution; and eſpecially ſince the aſſignats have conſiderably ſunk in their value, when applied to the purchaſe of wrought and raw materials, and the price paid for them in gold and ſilver?

The Engliſh, whoſe bills of exchange are paid in ſpecie in their own country, have taken advantage of the rate of exchange to make their purchaſes in France. Hence they have long purchaſed for one hundred pounds, the ſame materials for which the French have been obliged to pay two hundred. What is more, the French have paid ready money, while the Engliſh have given bills of exchange, drawn upon themſelves, at a ſtated time. This time has been regulated by the degree of credit they have procured upon France; and their bills are the meaſure of the quantity of their debt to us, and repreſent the claims we have upon them.

Thus, without any diſburſements, and with bills of exchange alone, the Engliſh have found, not only an immenſe credit in France, but likewiſe the means of gaining one or two hundred per cent. by their bargains, They have taken this occaſion of providing, at the cheapeſt rate, not only for their own actual wants, but for the future wants of all Europe, and even of ourſelves.

No perſon can deny, that the Engliſh had made enormous purchaſes of all our commodities. Hereafter, no doubt, their projects will be deſtructive to themſelves: they have meditated the ruin of our trade and manufactures, by preparing for the moſt unlimited rivalſhip over the whole earth. But in this vaſt conſpiracy, they will find their own deſtruction, for, from the preſent tendency of Europe, it is eaſy to perceive that luxury, this laſt tyrant of nations and ſcourge of freedom, muſt ſoon periſh; and with it thoſe hoarded aliments, which England had deſtined for its exiſtence.

In the mean time, it is ſtill true that this monopoly exiſts, and that all our manufactures have been purchaſed to be ſent abroad, and all our magazines emptied for foreigners. It is equally true that we are the creditors and not the debtors of theſe foreigners; eſpecially of the Engliſh, who have paid us only in bills of exchange.

What then would be the fact relative to the commercial debt of the propoſed confiſcation by France againſt France? Should we not immediately ſtrike out of our books an immenſe credit, which we ourſelves have given? Should we not make the Engliſh the magnificient preſent of our merchandiſe, and of the debt they owe us; that is, of the thing and of its value?

We have thus far, Citizens, only ſtated our relative ſituation with England; we have now to preſent you with ſome general views of our commercial relations with other nations, our preſent enemies.

Our manufactures, our arts, and our workmen have excluſively furniſhed Europe with the chief articles of luxury; that is, with painting, ſculpture, glaſs, embroidery, ſilks, and furniture of every kind. For two years paſt prodigious quantities of theſe various objects have been purchaſed in France; and it is but juſt that the debt contracted ſhould be entirely paid. Ought we with our own hands to annihilate this maſs of credit? Rather let us ſeek the certain means of recovering our capital in the ſhorteſt way poſſible. This is what we have to ſeek and ſubſtitute, inſtead of a confiſcation which would be fatal to the republic: and theſe ſalutary means of recovering and not of confiſcating our effects will ſoon be preſented to you.

But your committees have further commiſſioned me to ſtate confiſcation to you under another very important point of view;—I mean the ſums which the French poſſeſs in the foreign funds, and thoſe which foreigners have placed in the public funds of France. Every one will agree that the ſums placed by France in the foreign funds are conſiderable. It is therefore to be aſked, what is the amount of the ſums placed by foreigners in our funds, and in purchaſes of every kind? On this head the anſwer is poſitive; The inſpection of the regiſters, in which are inſerted the ſums placed in our public funds, is ſufficient to prove that confiſcation would not afford us a ſum equal to four days of our common expence; whereas our enemies, by way of repriſal would gain very conſiderable ſums; perhaps ſufficient for the expences of a whole campaign againſt the republic; eſpecially if we add the value of all our colonial products, the chief of which are depoſited in Holland. In theſe great points, therefore, confiſcation would be exceedingly prejudicial to France.

You have next, Citizens, to conſider territorial property; as well as that poſſeſſed by foreigners on the lands of the republic, as that poſſeſſed by the French in foreign countries. And here confiſcation ought to be conſidered under two points of view. With reſpect to real value, it is certain that the gain would be trifling; and as to political benefit it would be nearly null. There is ſcarcely any territorial property acquired in France, by the Engliſh, and eſpecially by the Dutch, which does not belong to the real friends of our revolution; to men who have preferred the land of liberty to their place of birth; or to others whom the love of our revolution has driven from their country, and who, confiding in our good faith and that hoſpitality which our laws and proclamations have promiſed, have come and intruſted us with ſuch remains of fortune as they have wreſted from tyranny.

No, Citizens, traitors and ſpies do not publicly become proprietors; and thoſe, who by ties of property have united their fate to that of our revolution, are not the men whoſe ruin the patriots require; or whom they would think it politic to puniſh, by confiſcation, for having loved France and freedom. I muſt again remind you, Citizens, how little ſuch confiſcation would be lucrative, while it would enſure repriſals far different in value; eſpecially with reſpect to thoſe numerous French patriots who have great property in Holland, and on the borders of the Rhine, where they cheriſh and maintain the ſeeds of our revolution.

And here, citizens, we might ſubmit other conſiderations ſtill more material to you, and perhaps more deciſive, but that your prudence would blame us, were we to mention them at the preſent moment. Beſides, your united committees have ſuppoſed that the motives we have already ſtated will be ſufficient to fix your judgement.

I ſhall conclude by a laſt and moſt important reflection. A wiſh is gone forth that we ſhould ſurround ourſelves by an impenetrable barrier, which ſhould render all points of contact between the French and other nations impoſſible. But is not this wiſh the very ſame which our moſt open enemies have manifeſted? Was it not to accompliſh this that Pitt has excited every power of Europe againſt us? Had this wiſh of Pitt been completely realized, would not famine very likely have overturned the republic? Would not the accompliſhment of this wiſh have confined within ourſelves, as an impenetrable ſecret, that ſacred revolution which ought to be revealed to all nations; teaching them their eternal rights, and inſpiring them with the love of liberty and the hatred of tyrants and their infamous ſupporters? Had this ſame wiſh of Pitt been effected, would not England have become the ſubſtitute of France in her commerce with the whole world? And would not this new conqueſt of her induſtry have ſupplied her with the certain means of preſcribing laws to Europe? In fine, would not this perfidious wiſh have deſtroyed every ſpring of our exterior policy, in favour of the people againſt deſpots? And what dangers might we not then have to expect from the profound cunning of all the Cabinets of Europe? Let us timely perceive this fatal ſnare: let us be certain that the wiſh of Pitt and Cobourg cannot be that of patriots; and let us not, by our own act, realize that which the combined efforts of our enemies could not effect againſt us.

Here followed the decree by which the property appertaining to all foreigners except Spaniards was ſecured.

On the twenty-ſecond of October it was decreed that all the prieſts taken in arms againſt the republic ſhould be put to death, and that all the clergy who had not taken the conſtitutional oaths, who were under ſixty years of age, ſhould be baniſhed to Guiana.

The advices from Toulon, from Lyons, from Vendée, and the insurrections promoted by the clergy; the detection of plots and the seizure of royal spies and conspirators, had raised the phrenzy of many members of the convention to the utmost pitch. The French admiral Turgoff had been purchased by the British, and had joined their fleet at Toulon, a letter from him to the republican commandant Lalande, dated "September seven, the first year of the reign of Louis XVII." was read on the twenty-sixth September in the convention, and excited a violent ferment; it occasioned the rage of the mountain to be turned on the accused deputies, and it was proposed in the heat of debate and decreed with loud acclamations, "that the committee should produce before noon of the next day the act of accusation against Brissot and the rest, under pain of being declared infamous;" but it was not till the third of October that the charge was presented by Amar in the name of the committee of public safety, and on the twenty-fourth of the same month their trial commenced.

The substance of the accusation was at length founded on a sort of sportive party romance written by Camille Desmoulins on Brissot and the Brissotins; and what was meant by the author merely to excite a laugh, was distorted to serve this horrible purpose. Camille, it is said remonstrated loudly on this perversion of his intentions, and disclaimed any participation in the guilt. He declared that the charges were only extravagancies of his own imagination, and that he could not support any of them by evidence. This remonstrance was ineffectual, and the romance formed part of the indictment, which was filled up with charges of royalism and federalism.

The witnesses in support of the charges consisted principally of the chiefs of the municipality of Paris, who were the original accusers. But the defence which the prisoners made was so entirely destructive of the accusation, that though the judges and the jury had bound up their nature to this execrable deed; though the audience, like the tribunes of the Jacobins and the convention, applauded this crime, the eloquence of the accused drew iron tears down their cheeks, and convinced the whole tribunal of the infamy and falsehood of the charges. Imagine the remorse with which the minds of the jury must have been wrung when their employment compelled them to dress out matter for condemnation from the absurd and lying fables of the conspirators, who were called as witnesses to the indictment; while, to the demonstration even of the most perverse and ignorant, the prisoners refuted every charge with triumph on their accusers; and if any suspicion had existed with respect to their patriotism or love of the republic, the prosecution would have served to dispel it.

The judges, as well as the jury, although determined to execute their atrocious commission, saw that the defence of the prisoners would carry conviction to the minds of the audience, who, notwithstanding their being hired by the accusers, began to shew signs of compassion. The court, therefore, wrote to the convention to inform them, that if the trials were permitted to proceed, the formalities of the law would reduce them to extreme difficulties; and observed, that in a revolutionary process it was not necessary to be incumbered with troublesome witnesses, or a long defence. This wicked epistle was supported by a deputation from the Jacobins, who spoke a still plainer language, by demanding a decree, that the accused should be condemned whenever the jury should feel themselves "sufficiently instructed" without attending to the whole of the charge, or hearing what the priſoners might have to allege in their defence. To this meaſure the ſociety was urged by the municipal witneſſes, who were ſtung with ſhame at ſeeing their perjuries unveiled.

The decree, empowering the jury to ſtop the proſecution at whatever period they thought proper, was virtually pronouncing the ſentence of death: and the tribunal, releaſing themſelves from the torture they were compelled to ſuffer, while their conſciences were every hour more and more loaded with the conviction of the innocence of the victims whoſe judicial murder they were bound to perpretrate, loſt no time in declaring that they were ſufficiently inſtructed.

Alas! in what were "they ſufficiently inſtructed?" That the men they were going to condemn, were thoſe who were the moſt diſtinguiſhed for talents, and were devoted to the eſtabliſhment of the republic, of which they were the founders. Were not this ſanguinary jury ſufficiently inſtructed, that it was for their virtues, and not their crimes, that theſe victims had been dragged before them? and yet with all the conviction on their minds, they coolly commanded the murder.

This atrocious condemnation was remonſtrated againſt by the priſoners in vain. In vain they alleged, that againſt ſome of them no evidence whatever had been heard; that their names had ſcarcely been mentioned at the tribunal; and that, whatever pretence the jury might have for calling themſelves ſufficiently inſtructed reſpecting the reſt, they could not be informed of the crimes of thoſe againſt whom no witneſſes had appeared. The court, ſheltering themſelves under the ſanction of a decree, were little inclined to give the reaſons of their conviction; and therefore replied to the arguments of the priſoners, by ordering the military force to take them from the tribunal. Valezé, in a tranſport of indignation, ſtabbed himſelf before the court. Briſſot, Vergniaud, Genſonné, Laſource, Fonfrede, Sillery, Ducos, Carra, Duperret, Gardien, Duprat, Fauchet, Beauvais, Duchaſtel, Mainvielle, Lacaze, Lehardy, Boileau, Anteboul, and Vigée, were led to execution on the following day. Vergniaud, having a preſage of his impending fate, had early provided himſelf with poiſon; but finding that his young friends Fonfrede and Ducos, who he had ſome hope would be ſpared, were companions of his misfortune, he gave the phial to the officer of the guard, reſolved to wait the appointed moment, and to periſh with them. Briſſot, who was always diſtinguiſhed as a man of uncommon courage, appeared perfectly tranquil; Carra and Fauchet, in ſome emotion; Boileau, and Laſource were in diſhabille; Ducos and Fonfrede, well dreſſed. When Boileau was aſked if he had choſen an official defender? he ſaid, he had given notice to one, and if he ſhould refuſe, he muſt make as good a defence for himſelf as he could. Antiboul, when aſked of what profeſſion he was? ſaid, "a defender of the rights of the people, and a perſecutor of tyrants." The act of accuſation calls Sillery "the diſhonoured confidant of a contemptible prince."

The ſubſtance of the act of accuſation has been already detailed, in reciting the matter of the two reports which had been preſented to the convention concerning them. It is remarkable, that among the crimes laid to their charge, are ſtated, the having cauſed war to be declared firſt againſt Auſtria, and afterwards againſt England and Holland. The chiefs of the mountain party, indeed, proteſted againſt the latter meaſure; and if we conſider the pains which the Gironde party took to avoid it, it is only fair to conclude that a rupture with great Britain was equally unpopular with both parties.

The article, however on which they were convicted was, having conſpired againſt the unity and indiviſibly of the republic, by exciting a rebellion in the departments of the ſouth and in that of Calvados. They were condemned at midnight, when they returned to their priſon they gave the appointed ſignal of their fate to their fellow-priſoners by a parody of the chorus of the Marſeillois hymn—" Contre nous de la tyrannie—L'éntandard ſanglant eſt levé." On the thirteenth of October twenty-one of theſe deputies, viz. Briſſot, Vergniaud, Genſonné, Duprat, Lehardi, Ducos, Fonfrede, Boileau, Gardien, Duchaſtel, Sillery, Fauchet, Dufriche, Duperret, Laſource, Carra, Beauvais, Mainville, Antiboul, Vigée and Lacaze, were conveyed from the priſon to the Place de la Revolution, and executed. They met their fate with all the calmneſs of innocence and the dignity of heroic virtue, breathing their laſt vows for the ſafety of the republic.

Briſſot was a native of Chartres and the ſchool-fellow of Petion, between them ſubſiſted a ſtrong friendſhip; he left behind him a work which throws much light on the hiſtory of the revolution; it was compoſed and prepared for publication on the twenty-third of May, a week before the proſcription of himſelf and his friends; in this he aſſerts that the whole truth had not been told by either party from the commencement of the revolution; that fear governed them all from firſt to laſt; and that to the operations of the factious might be attributed the greater number of evils that had afflicted France. Many important facts are alſo accounted for, though it is apparent that with all his juſtly acknowleged candor he had been unde the general influence of fear himſelf, and of a reliance upon theoretical combinations to account for events which were the reſult of oppoſite cauſes. We have the character of Briſſot drawn by two perſons who knew him intimately, than whom none appear to have been more capable of appreciating his talents and his virtues, Madame Roland and the miniſter Garat; the latter has ſurvived him, and riſing above the reſentments which might have been excited by a cenſure of Briſſot on that miniſter, he does juſtice to the memory of his miſtaken friend, and diſplays his talents and his virtues with all the generoſity of genius and the frankneſs of virtue. 'Among the members of the right ſide, whoſe death has ſhed immortal honours on their lives and talents,' ſays Garat, 'there were ſome men, friends dear to my heart. In our common intercourſe with the world, I had frequently met with Briſſot; and amid thoſe arogant, yet frivolous ſlaves, whoſe meanneſs of mind, was partially veiled by their dreſs and oſtentation of luxury, he and I had communicated to each other ſome of thoſe ſentiments which minds truly free alone could know, ſome of thoſe hopes which none but philoſophers could conceive. He ſought for ideas in books and languages more than in his own mind. He wrote more than he meditated. His paſſion for truth being more ardent than founded on ſound reaſon and true diſcernment, often entangled him in thoſe quarrels, in which at firſt it is only ſome doctrine that is the matter of conteſt, afterwards the diſpute becomes wholly perſonal. But amidſt extraordinary activity and extreme poverty his morals had always appeared ſimple and pure; his ambition to have no object but the liberty and the welfare of the people. Theſe ſentiments and his turn of mind, were in him rather religion than philoſophy. Although paſſionately fond of glory, he would have conſented to bury himſelf in everlaſting obſcurity, to have converted mankind into a congregation of quakers, to have become the Penn of Europe—and this man was to die as a buſy-body of intrigue as a conſpirator." Such was the character of Briſſot drawn by Garat; hear madame Roland ſpeak.—'The ſimplicity of Briſſot's manners, his frankneſs, his natural negligence, ſeemed to me in perfect harmony with the auſterity of his principles: but I found in him a ſort of lightneſs of mind and character which was not very conſiſtent with the ſerioufneſs of a philoſopher. This diſpoſition always gave me uneaſineſs, and his enemies always took advantage of it. The more I became acquainted with him, the greater was my eſteem. It is impoſſible for any one to unite a more perfect diſintereſtedneſs to a more ardent zeal for the public ſervice, or feel with ſo perfect a forgetfulneſs of his own intereſt a greater deſire of doing good. But his writings are more fitted than his perſon to effect it, becauſe they have all the authority which reaſon, juſtice, and knowledge give to literary works, while his figure from its want of dignity inſpires no reſpect. He is the beſt of human beings; a good huſband, a tender father, a faithful friend, and a virtuous citizen. His converſation is as mild as his character is eaſy. Confident even to imprudence, gay and ſprightly as a youth of fifteen, he was formed to live with the wiſe and be the dupe of the wicked. As a well-informed politician, and ſtudying during his whole life the different relations of ſociety, and the means of procuring the greater quantity of happineſs for the human race, he was well acquainted with the nature of man, but altogether ignorant of the characters of men. He knew that vice exiſted, but he never could believe him to be a vicious man who ſpoke to him with an open countenance; and when he diſcovered ſuch perſons he treated them as fools whom he ought to pity, without taking any precautions againſt them. He could not hate; his mind though very ſuſceptible, had not ſolidity enough for ſo vigorous a ſentiment. His knowledge was ſo extenſive, that all literary labour was to him extremely eaſy; and he compoſed a treatiſe with the ſame facility as another would copy a ſong; an experienced eye will therefore diſcern in his works, together with an excellent fund of information, the haſty touches of a rapid and ſometimes a ſlight mind. His activity, his good humour, never refuſing to join in any thing that he thought uſeful, have given him the air of meddling in every thing, with thoſe who want capacity to meddle in any thing, and have ſubjected him to animadverſions as an intriguer, by thoſe who were deſirous to be intriguers or to find fault. A curious kind of an intriguer indeed! a man who never thought of himſelf, or even the intereſt of his friends; as incapable, as averſe to look after his own concerns; who is no more aſhamed of poverty than afraid of death, conſidering both as the frequent rewards of real public virtues.

'Conſecrating the whole of his time to the revolution, without any other motives than wiſhing to ſee the triumph of truth, and concurring in the eſtabliſhment of the public good; working diligently at his Journal, which he might eaſily have made a good ſubject of ſpeculation, but contenting himſelf with the moderate ſhare allowed him by his partner. His wife modeſt as himſelf with much prudence and great ſtrength of mind formed a ſeverer judgment of things. She had turned her attention conſtantly ſince their marriage towards the United States of America, as the place moſt ſuited to their taſte and their manners, and where it was eaſy to live with a ſmall income. Briſſot had made a voyage thither, and they were on the point of departure when the revolution fixed them in France.'

It was originally the intention of Robeſpierre to have put to death Briſſot and Genſonne only; cruelty which is ſo conſtantly united with cowardice, would not permit him to propoſe at once ſo ſtupendous an aſſaſſination; but Collot and Billaud, made up in ſternneſs for his deficiency and confirmed the fate of the whole.

From the admirable work of Garat, who was miniſter of juſtice at this period, we learn that he felt a deep intereſt in the fate of the deputies, and conceiving an hope from that natural goodneſs of heart which Danton veiled under a rough exterior and a ſonorous voice, he waited on him; Danton complained of illneſs, but it was the effect of profound grief and conſternation at what was going on. "I cannot ſave them," were the firſt words he uttered to Garat, before the latter had yet ſpoken! They converſed, and while he ſpoke, the gigantic ſtrength of Danton ſeemed to languiſh; tears fell in big round drops down that countenance, the caſt and expreſſion of which ſo ſtrongly correſponded with his muſcular power, his thundering voice, and energetic mind. But it was too clear that no hope could now be entertained; fear pervaded every member of the mountain, and their perſonal ſecurity prevented thoſe from interpoſing who might by that circumſtance be included in the common proſcription. He waited on Robert, another member of the mountain, but they were both perſuaded that all depended on Robeſpierre; that if he demanded it, blood would be ſhed. He waited on Robeſpierre himſelf—but he was inexorable.

Theſe proſcriptions were followed by others over which alſo the ſciences and the virtues wept. Immediately after the execution of the Gironde, madame Roland, the wife of the proſcribed miniſter, was ſent to the priſon of St. Pelagie. Her huſband had fled on the thirty-firſt of May. When brought before the revolutionary tribunal ſhe preſerved the moſt heroic firmneſs, though ſhe was treated with ſuch barbatity, and inſulted by queſtions ſo injurious to her honor, that ſometimes tears of indignation ſtarted in her eyes. This celebrated woman, who, even at the bar of the convention, had by the commanding graces of her eloquence forced even from her enemies the tribute of applauſe and admiration, was now in the hands of wretches by whom her fine talents were not felt or underſtood—Her defence however is preſerved, and deſerves the record of hiſtory, for its ſtrength, it clearneſs, and the magnanimous ſpirit which pervaded its compoſition; and as the charges alleged againſt her have been only publiſhed in a general way, the reply will form as an expoſition of them alſo:—

'The accuſation againſt me is founded wholly on the ſuppoſition of my being an accomplice with men called conſpirators. My friendſhip for a few of thoſe perſons is prior to the political circumſtances which form the charge againſt them. The correſpondence I held with them by an intermediate channel, at the time of their departure, is altogether foreign to ſtate affairs. I have had in truth no political correſpondence; and in this reſpect I might abſolutely deny the charge; yet, though I cannot be called upon to give an account of my private affections, I may glory in them, as I do in the whole of my conduct, and I have nothing to conceal from the world.

'I declare then, that I have received teſtimonies of regret on account of my impriſonment, and was informed that Duperret had two letters for me; but whether written before or after my friends left Paris; whether from one or two of them, I am altogether ignorant, ſince theſe letters have never reached me. At another time I was earneſtly conjured to eſcape from my priſon, and received offers of aſſiſtance in the attempt, and to convey me to whatever place I ſhould think proper. I was deterred from accepting theſe offers from conſiderations both of duty and honor; of duty, becauſe I would not injure thoſe to whoſe care I was committed; of honour, ſince in all caſes I ſhould prefer expoſing myſelf to the conſequences of every poſſible vexation, rather than incur the appearances of guilt, by a flight unworthy of my character. I ſhould not have been ſo careleſs with regard to my ſafety on the thirty-firſt of May, had I had an intention of effecting my eſcape at a latter period. This is the extent of my connections with my friends who fled. Undoubtedly if the communication had not been interrupted between us, or if I had not been reſtrained by my impriſonment, I ſhould have endeavoured to procure information concerning them, for I know of no law that forbids it. Alas! in what age, or amongſt what people were thoſe ſentiments of eſteem and fidelity, which bind men to each other, ever accounted a crime? I do not pretend to decide upon the meaſures taken by thoſe who were proſcribed; but I never will believe that theſe men intended ill, whoſe integrity, patriotiſm, and generous devotion to their country I have ſeen ſo clearly diſplayed. If they have erred, their errors are thoſe of virtue; they are overcome without being degraded; they are unfortunate in my eyes without being guilty. If I am criminal in offering vows for their ſafety, I declare myſelf ſo to the whole world. I am under no concern for their glory, and I willingly ſhare in the honor of being oppreſſed by their enemies. I have known thoſe generous men who are accuſed of having conſpired againſt their country. They were firm but humane republicans; they were perſuaded that good laws were neceſſary to make the republic beloved by thoſe who had no confidence in its ſtability; but this was indeed a more difficult taſk than to murder them. The hiſtory of all ages has proved that great talents are neceſſary to lead men to virtue by good laws, while violence alone has been ſufficient to reſtrain them by terror, or annihilate them by death. I have heard my friends maintain that plenty, like happineſs, could only reſult from an equitable government; that the omnipotence of bayonets could produce fear, but not bread. I have ſeen them animated with the warmeſt enthuſiaſm for the happineſs of the people, diſdaining to flatter them, determined to fall the victims of their blindneſs rather than deceive them. I own that theſe principles and this conduct have appeared to me altogether different from thoſe of tyrants and ambitious men, who amuſe the people only to enſlave them. It is for theſe reaſons that I am filled with eſteem for theſe generous men. This error, if it be one, will go with me to the grave, and I ſhall glory in following thoſe whom I could not accompany thither.

'My defence, I may venture to aſſert, is more neceſſary to thoſe who are deſirous of being informed, than it is to myſelf. Conſcious of having fulfilled my duties, I look to futurity with ſecurity and confidence. My taſte for ſtudy and my habits of retirement kept me at a diſtance both from the folli of diſſipation, and from the buſtle of intrigue. Enamoured of liberty, the value of whic I have learnt from reflection, I viewed the revolution with tranſport, perſuaded that it was the epocha of the ſubverſion of deſpotiſm, which I deteſt; of the reformation of abuſes, under which I had often ſighed, while the fate of the unhappy and oppreſſed hung upon my heart. I have followed the progreſs of the revolution with ſolicitude. I have expreſſed myſelf on the ſubject with warmth; but I have never over-paſſed the limits preſcribed me by my ſex. Some talents perhaps, a little philoſophy, a greater degree of courage, and which in times of danger did not leſſen, that of my huſband, are probably what thoſe who knew me have imprudently aſcribed to me, and which may have contributed to make me enemies amongſt thoſe by whom I was not known. Roland ſometimes employed me as his ſecretary; and the celebrated letter to the king, for inſtance, was drafted wholly by me. This would be a good paper enough to frame part of my indictment, if the Auſtrians were my proſecutors, and thought proper to extend the reſponſibility of the miniſter to his wife. But Roland had long ſince diſplayed his ſentiments, and his love of great principles. The evidence of this exiſts in the numerous books which he has publiſhed during theſe fifteen years paſt. His knowlege and his integrity are eminently his own; and he had no need of a wife to become a wife and faithful miniſter. Neither conferences nor cabals have been held at his houſe. His friends, his colleagues, whoever they were, and his acquaintances met at his houſe once a week, where in very public converſation they diſcourſed openly on topics in which every one was intereſted. On the whole, the writings of this miniſter breathe throughout the love of order and peace, explaining in the moſt affecting manner the beſt principles of morality and policy. They will for ever bear witneſs to his wiſdom, as the accounts he has given in bear witneſs to his integrity.

'I return to the crime imputed to me. I obſerve that I had no intimate acquaintance with Duperret. I had ſometimes ſeen him, while my huſband was miniſter, but he had not viſited me during the ſix months that have elapſed ſince Roland quitted the adminiſtration: and I might make the ſame remark reſpecting the other deputies who were our friends; which certainly does not tally with the accuſation of conſpiracy and ſecret underſtanding imputed to us. It is clear from my firſt letter to Duperret, that I wrote to this deputy, only becauſe I found it difficult to write to any other, with the idea that he would be inclined to render me ſome ſervice. My correſpondence with him, therefore, was not projected; it was not the ſequel of any preceding connections; and it had no political view. It furniſhed me with an opportunity of receiving intelligence of thoſe who were abſent, and with whom I was in habits of friendſhip, altogether independent of political conſiderations. Such conſiderations formed no part of the correſpondence which I held with them, in the firſt moment of their abſence. No memorial to this effect is brought againſt me. Thoſe which are produced, only intimate that I ſhare in the opinions of thoſe who are called conſpirators. This induction is founded, I own it to the world, and I glory in this conformity of ſentiment; but I have never publiſhed theſe ſentiments in any manner that can be imputed to me as a crime. In order to eſtabliſh the being an accomplice in any project, it muſt be proved that advice has been given and means furniſhed. I have done neither; I am therefore not guilty in the eyes of the law; there is none which can condemn me; there exiſts no fact for the application of any.

'I know that in great revolutions, law as well as juſtice is often forgotten; and the evidence of this is, that I am at this bar. I am indebted for this proſecution only to thoſe prejudices and that violent hatred which burſts forth amidſt great convulſions, and which, in general, fix upon thoſe who are placed in conſpicious ſituations, or who are known to poſſeſs energy of character. It would have been eaſy for me to have avoided this trial which I foreſaw; but I thought it more becoming to meet it; I thought that I owed this example to my country; I thought that if I ſhould be condemned, I ſhould leave to my tyrants the odium of ſacrificing a woman, who had no other crime than perhaps ſome talents of which ſhe ſeldom availed herſelf, great zeal for the intereſts of mankind, courage to adhere to her unfortunate friends, and to render homage to truth at the hazard of her life. Thoſe who have true greatneſs of ſoul throw away ſelfiſh feelings, remember that they belong only to the ſpecies, and look to futurity for their reward. I belong to the virtuous and perſecuted Roland. I was in habits of friendſhip with men whom ignorance and the jealous hatred of low, vulgar minds have proſcribed and murdered. I am to periſh alſo, becauſe it is conſiſtent with the principles of tyranny to ſacrifice thoſe whom it has cruelly oppreſſed, and annihilate every witneſs of its crimes. Under both theſe titles you ought to condemn me to die, and I await my ſentence. When innocence mounts the ſcaffold, to which it is condemned by error or wickedneſs, it reaches the goal of triumph. May I be the laſt victim that ſhall be ſacrificed! I ſhall leave with joy this unhappy land, which is deſtroying the good, and drinking in the blood of the juſt. O truth, my country, friendſhip, ſacred objects, ſentiments dear to my heart, receive my laſt offering! My life was devoted to you, and ye alone ſpread a ſoftneſs and grace over my laſt moments! God of heaven! enlighten this unhappy people, for whoſe liberty I breathe my warmeſt vows!—Liberty!—to thoſe great ſouls it eminently belongs who deſpiſe death, and can meet it with courage; but it was not formed for weak minds, who compound with crimes, while they conceal their ſelf-love and their cowardice under the name of prudence. It was not formed for thoſe profligate men, who, riſing from their beds of debauchery, or creeping forth from a ſink of wretchedneſs, run and bathe themſelves in the blood that ſtreams from the ſcaffolds. But it is the guardian of a wiſe and humane people, who practiſe juſtice, deſpiſe flatterers, know their true friends, and revere truth. As long as you ſhall not form ſuch a people; O my fellow-citizens! you will talk in vain of liberty; you will live only in a ſtate of licentiouſneſs, of which each of you will fall the victim, in your turn; you will aſk for bread, but you will find only mangled carcaſes, and you will end in being ſlaves.

'I have concealed neither my ſentiments, or opinions. I know that a Roman lady was ſent to execution under Tiberius, for having lamented her ſon. I know that in times of blindneſs and party-ſpirit, whoever dares to avow himſelf the friend of condemned or proſcribed men, expoſes himſelf to ſhare their fate; but I deſpiſe death. I have never feared any thing but guilt; and I would not purchaſe my life at the price of meanneſs.

'Unhappy times, unhappy people, when the obligation of rendering juſtice to injured virtue is beſet with danger; but too happy are thoſe who have courage to brave it.—It is now for you to examine if it be compatible with your intereſts to comdemn in defect of evidence, for ſimple opinions only, and without the ſupport of any law.'

But the verity and dignity of this extraordinary woman rendered her more obnoxious to the hatred of her perſecutors—She was ſentenced to death—She heard it with equanimity, and indignantly replied—"You think me worthy, then, of ſharing the fate of "thoſe brave men whom you have aſſaſſinated. I will endeavour to go to the ſcaffold "with the ſame courage they diſplayed."

On the way to the ſcaffold ſhe was not only compoſed, but ſometimes aſſumed an air of gaiety in order to encourage an unfortunate man who was doomed to ſuffer with her, but who did not poſſeſs the ſame fortitude. When arrived at the ſcaffold, as only one perſon ſuffered at a time, ſhe was to be the firſt victim, as even the executioners felt more reſpect for her ſex than to add to their pangs the witneſſing the death of others. But when ſhe obſerved the diſmay of her companion, ſhe turned to the executioner and begged the ſad indulgence of remaining laſt—"go firſt," ſaid ſhe to the unhappy and trembling victim, "let me at leaſt ſpare you the pain of ſeeing my blood ſhed." The executioner, however, told her that his orders were that ſhe ſhould periſh firſt—"but you cannot, I am ſure," ſaid ſhe, "refuſe the laſt requeſt of a lady." Her demand was complied with. She then mounted the ſcaffold herſelf, and lifting her eyes to a ſtatue of liberty, that ſtood near the place, exclaimed "Ah! liberty how haſt thou been ſported with!" the next moment ſhe periſhed.

In the early dawn of freedom in France, this lady appeared deſtined to diſplay a conſpicious figure, the ſhare ſhe had in the celebrated letter to Louis XVI. has been already noticed. Her mind was endowed with the pureſt ſtores of erudition and taſte, and the works produced by her huſband and herſelf, for they always publiſhed conjunctly, will immortalize them both. She had predicted that he would not ſurvive her, and the prediction was fulfilled, he terminated an exiſtence which he deemed no longer worthy of regard, in a wood between Paris and Rouen, the papers left by him were ſent to the committee of ſafety, but have never tranſpired. Her appeal to poſterity has been ſince publiſhed and merits the moſt particular regard. She left an only daughter who found an aſylum with a courageous friend. In her perſon ſhe was tall and well ſhaped, her air was dignified, and although more than thirty-five years of age, was ſtill handſome. Her countenance had an uncommon expreſſion of ſweetneſs, and her full black eyes beamed with the brighteſt rays of intelligence; in her converſation ſhe diſplayed the moſt ardent attachment to liberty, it had been the ſubject of her ſtudies ere yet the revolution was generally foreſeen; and ſhe developed her ſentiments with a flow of eloquence and power of expreſſion which gave additional grace and energy to the French language.

Among thoſe moſt diſtinguiſhed for their talents, who either ſuffered on the ſcaffold or ſought death to diſappoint their enemies, was Bailly, the firſt mayor of Paris in the revolution, renowned for his aſtronomical reſearches, and for his immortal works on chronology. The charge againſt him, was a participation in the eſcape of Louis to Varennes, and authoriſing the troops to fire on the people, in July, 1791. He was to have been executed in the Champ de Mars, but the caprice of the infuriated populace compelled him to wait two hours drenched in rain in the midſt of winter, while the ſcaffold was removed to an adjoining field; but what was worſe expoſed to the inſults of an execrable ſet of wretches who uſually attended ſuch ſcenes. He ſubmitted to their inſults with equanimity, requeſting mildly that his ſufferings might be terminated. One of theſe ſavages ſaid to him in a tone of mockery—"You tremble Bailly"—"It is very cold "my friend," ſaid the ſage.—His ſufferings were ſoon after terminated.

Lavoiſier the celebrated chemiſt, was another of the proſcribed; his crime was having been under the old government one of the famers-general. He had been long employed in an important philoſophical experiment, he requeſted only the ſhort period of a fortnight to complete it—his prayer was not granted. Rabaut de St. Etienne a proteſtant clergyman was condemned for having been one of the commiſſion of twelve appointed by the convention to enquire into conſpiracies. Manuel who had been ſo active on the tenth of Auguſt, and afterwards was ſo ſolicitous to ſave the king, was condemned oſtenſibly for the latter circumſtance, but really for that pain which his brilliant flaſhes of wit ſo often occaſioned in the rankling boſoms of the uſurping aſſaſſins. The veteran Luckner alſo ſuffered death; and not the leaſt remarkable of the victims of this period the ſometime duke of Orleans, who had latterly aſſumed the name of Philip Egalite. We have before obſerved on the character of this man, that he was an object of ſuſpicion and jealouſy with every party, that all agreed in reproaching him, but that none produced any actual evidence of conſpiracy againſt him; the principal ground of odium has been attached to his vote on the trial of the king, on which he delivered his opinion for death to this effect—" Regardful only of my duty, feeling that every man who conſpires " againſt the freedom of my country or attempts to uſurp power, contrary to the con- " ſtitution as eſtabliſhed by the people, is criminal; I, upon the moſt mature examination, " declare my opinion, that he is guilty—and vote therefore for death."

That this man's early life partook of that voluptuouſneſs that was the neceſſary conſequence of his education, his rank, and his ample fortune, is beyond diſpute; that he exceeded his relations in vice, has never been aſſerted; and if the leſſer degree of profligacy is entitled to indulgence, his character will appear arrayed in white compared with that of Artois or the queen of France. His fortune which was the greateſt of any private individual in Europe, amounting to one hundred and fifty thouſand pounds ſterling per annum, was employed before the revolution in promoting the moſt uſeful arts and manufactures in his own country, in beautifying and enriching his eſtates, and forwarding by every means of uſeful activity the induſtry and comfort of thoſe who lived on them; that he was attached to the forms of a free government, was a ſubject of accuſation againſt him before the revolution had been ſuſpected to be ſo near, and that all his conduct in every ſtage of the revolution was in perfect harmony with his early profeſſions, has never once been queſtioned. The court accuſed him of aſpiring to the throne, aad in this accuſation it is remarkable the Gironde and the mountain concurred. Yet is was next to poſitively proved that the queen had engaged a perſon to aſſaſſinate him, and that it was from a principle of reſentment ariſing from a very different cauſe. The two parties never produced a ſingle fact to criminate him, and each reſpectively accuſed the other of partaking of his riches and promoting his views, though the perſons ſuppoſed to be enriched actually continued poor. His conduct on the trial of the king is ſtigmatized upon the preſumption of his violating the laws of nature and the ties of blood. There is undoubtedly much plauſibility in this charge. But ſuppoſing Egalite to be all that was vile; upon the principle of his vote, it muſt be neceſſary to his guilt, to prove that the king was innocent, and that his perſonal ſafety in that critical time could have admitted of any choice of his vote in obedience to a principle of tenderneſs.

Poſterity will certainly examine the character of this man by rules more claſſical and diſpaſſionate than it has been hitherto done. To eſcape from the vortex in which he was placed was certainly a bold hope, if he entertained it; his conduct in priſon on his removal to Marſeilles exhibited a mind made up to rough the ſtorms of deſtiny, and the coolneſs he diſplayed belied an imputation of cowardice that had been attached to him by his enemies. He was brought to Paris in the beginning of November, and condemned on a charge of aſpiring to the monarchy; the evidence has never been publiſhed. On the ſixth of November in the evening he was conveyed in a cart, amidſt the rebukes and inſults of the populace. The monſters of the day had directed the cart to ſtop ten minutes before his former reſidence, upon which he looked with extraordinary compoſure; at the ſcaffold he was equally unembarraſſed, and the executioner wiſhing to take off his boots in order to tie his legs to the plank, he obſerved with a ſmile of good humour, "why take that trouble, you may in a few moments take them with greater "eaſe from the dead carcaſe."

DUKE of ORLEANS.

Among the number of thoſe who ſnatched themſelves by voluntary death from the hands of the tyrants, was Claviere, the co-miniſter of Roland; his wife likewiſe embraced voluntary death along with him; Achilles du Chatelet, one of the club of five in the beginning of the revolution, was another; indeed all of that club, but Thomas Paine, have died in either way. Giry Dupre, was put to death merely for being the friend of Briſſot; being queſtioned as to the moral character of Briſſot, he ſaid, "I ſwear that "Briſſot lived like Ariſtides and died like Sydney, the martyr of liberty." The picture of theſe days of horror are finely pourtrayed by the eloquent pen of Garat,—"Under the tyrannical domination of Robeſpierre and under Billaud, little doubtful of the fate that awaited me, I kept conſtantly about me means, by which I might at any time diſpoſe of my own life. ſo as to baffle the murderous fury of the tyrant. It was a conſolation to me, to reflect that I was in poſſeſſion of ſuch means, and that I had made a proper choice of them. Yet, after mature deliberation, I reſolved to make no uſe of them. The principles of Socrates, upon the ſubject of ſubmiſſion to the laws and to ſocial order, even when theſe are repreſented by judges the moſt unjuſt, had always appeared to me to be the extravagance of magnanimity and virtue. But when I now again examined them with an immediate view to my own ſituation and conduct, they appeared to me inviolably ſacred and ſublime. Amidſt thoſe many horrors, which, for a courſe of eight months were hidden in the ſhades of each returning night, only to be again diſplayed by the blaze of the riſing day, I did not find that the natural pains and anxieties of death, could be, in any conſiderable degree, enhanced to my imagination by the proſpect of that paſſage to the ſcaffold, in which the ſufferer might ſhew to the ſurrounding people, with what tranquil fortitude the innocent can die!— O thou who, from delineating A SKETCH OF THE PROGRESS OF THE HUMAN MIND, didſt withdraw thy hand, but to preſent the deadly beverage to thy lips; thy final determination to die, was founded upon different ſeutiments, and different reaſons: Thou didſt ſet thy republican ſoul at everlaſting liberty, by the uſe of that poiſon which we had ſhared between us, as two brothers would ſhare their laſt morſel of bread!— Thou art no more!— but I ſtill live, to meet the accuſations of men, who, as well as I, invoke thy name with paſſionate veneration; but who would not, like me, expoſe themſelves to dangers infinitely greater than thoſe which actually environed them, in order to ſave from the graſp of the executioner, a life of which the loſs muſt long be felt as a misfortune by France and by Europe.* "

Proſcription now embraced a multitude of perſons whoſe names will live diſtinguiſhed in the the brighteſt annals of ſcience and liberty,—and had Salluſt been the hiſtorian of theſe unhappy times, he might have found that his picture given of the Catalinian war† would have applied, only with the change of names.

But the revolting ſenſes turn from thoſe ſcenes of deliberate aſſaſſination, and find a ſtrange refuge even in the wider deſolations of war. The hurricane, the earthquake, the volcano, thoſe convulſions in nature which ſhake the earth to its baſis, and ſeem to threaten annihilation, are not ſo terrible in their effects as war, and yet compared with the proſcriptions of civil commotion, even theſe effects appear leſs henious leſs afflicting to the heart. We read of cities beſieged and taken by ſtorm, of the inſidious mine which ſhatters a thouſand limbs at a blow, and of the cannon and the bomb that performs deſtruction openly, and ſtrange we do not ſympathiſe very deeply or durably in their hiſtory. But the miſeries of civil proſcription live for ever on the memory, and excite indelible ſympathies.

* This beautiful apoſtrophe is addreſſed to the memory of Condorcet.

† "In primo cœpere peſſimum," &c. Sall. in Bello Catil. et paſſim in fragmentis.

When the laws of war even according to the regulations of civilized ſociety are obſerved, the miſeries are ſtill tremendous; the laws of nature are perverted; it is the young, not the old, that deſcend firſt to the grave, and all the dear and tender relations of life are broken: the father laments his ſon, the wife her huſband; the orphan its parent;—whole countries are depopulated, the fields lie uncultivated, and famine pervades all and produces deſpair; but theſe ſcenes are familiar to hiſtory; civil preſcription is more rare. The ſoldier climbing precipices, or ſcaling walls, ſeeking the bubble reputation in the cannon's mouth, attach ideas of valour, of heroiſm, which diminiſh the horror of their effects, becauſe perhaps our inſtincts anticipate our reaſon, and declare that in the exiſting ſtate of man, deeds of hardihood and valour are eſſential to the general preſervation; war has its limits beyond which it cannot proceed, we know and ſee its utmoſt bounds; but civil proſcription knows no limits, it violates all maxims and principles, and the moſt virtuous are too conſtantly its victims; hence perhaps it is that we feel its afflictions the more, and that the carnage of battle, the indiſcriminate rage of the mercenary and diſciplined murderer, the maſſacre of the old, the infant, and the defenceleſs, the conflagration of whole cities, and the deſolation of provinces, appear with only a ſecondary horror; and that removed from the ſcene in which they are paſſing, they are treated as the themes of romance, and no more regarded than if they could never occur again.

The decree of the convention for riſing in a body and marching againſt their enemies, acted like an incantation, and ſeemed to preduce an army as if by a miracle. Early in September Landau had been inveſted by the combined powers; but while the French maintained the ſtrong lines at Weiſſembourg, and on the Lauter, there was little proſpect of ſucceſs. On the thirteenth of October therefore, general Wurmſer made a grand attack on the lines of Lauter, and carried the whole with the town of Lauterbourg. The French accounts of this action ſay that their generals betrayed them, that they permitted the Auſtrians to force the lines without taking means to reſiſt the onſet effectually, and Wurmſer acknowledges in his diſpatches that the place might have held out for ſeveral days. The barbarity of the Auſtrians after this action harrows up the ſoul; when they took the poſt of Anterre, the inhabitants precipitately fled, and the women ſought refuge in the woods. They were purſued by the Auſtrian ſoldiers, who hewed off the breaſts of the mothers, and toſſed the infants from one to the other on the points of their bayonets; they broke the arms and thruſt out the eyes of the old men and women, and left them to expire in that miſerable condition. This ferocious and inhuman conduct produced a retaliation, the people of the ſurrounding country were rouſed, and ſix thouſand of them, with the firſt weapons they could find, ruſhed upon a body of the aſſaſſins, and deſtroyed fifteen hundred of them without mercy.

P.J.CAMBON

Weiſſembourg made a more formidable reſiſtance, and was not carried without the loſs of eight hundred men. The French retreated towards Hagenau, from which however they were diſlodged on the eighteenth, and the Pruſſian general proceeded towards Straſburg, defeating a body of the republicans on the twenty-fifth, and took poſſeſſion of Wanzenau. On the twenty-ſeventh the French attacked the Auſtrians, but after an obſtinate engagement, in which they were ſuppoſed to have loſt three thouſand men, were obliged to retreat.

In the beginning of November the deputies St. Juſt and Lebas, were ſent to Straſburg, to reorganize the diſcomfitted troops. They ordered immenſe reinforcements from the neighbouring departments, and to afford a ſalutary example of ſeverity, general Irembert, who was convicted of treachery in the affair of Weiſſembourg, was ſhot at the head of the army on the ninth of that month: A conſpiracy was alſo diſcovered at Straſburg, ſeveral emigrants having found means to obtain admiſſion into that city, in the diſguiſe of wounded ſoldiers, and had organized a plan under the direction of the marquis of St. Hillaire, for the delivery of the place; their correſpondence was diſcovered, and the conſpirators ſeized together with a banker in whoſe hands their funds were depoſited, and the whole were executed.

Theſe vigorous proceedings, however, were not ſufficient to preſerve Saar Louis (or Fort Vauban) which fell into the hands of Wurmſer on the fourteenth, though not without ſuſpicions of treachery on the part of the commandant. Here however the ſucceſs of Wurmſer terminated, for on the twenty-fifth of November, the Auſtrians were compelled to retreat, and the republican army penetrated to Vautruan and almoſt to the gates of Hagenau.

Meanwhile the army of the Moſelle advanced to co-operate with the grand army on the Rhine, and on the 17th of November the Pruſſians were defeated near Saarbruck with ſome loſs. On the ſucceeding day the Pruſſian camp at Blieſcaſtel was ſtormed and taken by the republicans, under the command of general Hoche, then in about his 24th year; he immediately advanced toward Deux-Ponts, and carried the poſt of Hornback, and the heights of Milleback; theſe three attacks were conducted with ſignal intrepidity and ſkill, and obliged the Pruſſians immediately to abandon Deux-Ponts.

On the twenty-ninth, and thirtieth of November the French were repulſed with conſiderable loſs in two ſpirited attacks near Lautern; but theſe were more than compenſated by the ſucceſſes of Pichegru, who on the eighteenth of December carried with fixed bayonets all the redoubts of the allies which covered Hagenau; and on the twenty-ſecond drove them with immenſe ſlaughter from Biſchoiliers, Duſcheim, and Hagenau, notwithſtanding the almoſt continued works with which they had covered the line which joined the two poſts. The entrenchments on the heights of Beiſhoffen, Jauderſhofen, and Treyewillers-Radneith, are repreſented to have been not leſs formidable than thoſe of Gemappe, and preſented three amphitheatrical ranges of redoubts which the allies deemed impregnable. They were ſtormed however by Hoche with the army of the Moſelle, who had recently joined Pichegru, and carried at the point of the bayonet. On the twenty-third aud twenty-fourth the French purſued the enemy to the heights of Wrotte, where they had alſo erected moſt formidable entrenchments. On the twenty-ſixth Pichegru prepared to attack them in form, but after a fruitleſs cannonade, the republican ſoldiers called out to ſound the charge, and marched up to the foot of the entrenchments. The conflict was deſparate; and laſted from two to five o'clock in the afternoon. At half paſt ſix the French were maſters of the heights, and at ten all the enemy's poſts were abandoned. On the twenty-ſeventh the republicans entered Weiſſemburg in triumph. Wurmſur made good his retreat to the Rhine, and the duke of Brunſwick haſtily retreated to cover Mentz.

The prince of Hohenloe had ſummoned Landau, on the fourteenth of December; but receiving an indignant reply from general Labaudere, the Pruſſian general Knobelſdorf attempted to eſtabliſh an illicit intercourſe with the garriſon which was indignantly repelled. In conſequence of which the ſiege was raiſed. Keiſerſlautern, Guermerſheim, and Spires immediately ſubmitted to the republic.

In the north but little was performed on either ſide during the latter part of the campaign. On the nineteenth of November a trifling ſkirmiſh took place between a part of the garriſon of Ypres, and a party of French who attempted to eſtabliſh themſelves at Poperingue, from which they were diſlodged with the loſs of forty-five priſoners. On the twenty-eighth they attacked the out poſts of the duke of York at Nechin and Liers, but were repulſed with ſome loſs, and on the thirtieth were again unſucceſsful in an attack on the ſame poſts.

The tranſactions of Toulon were in themſelves ſo momentous, that in the progreſs of the preceding hiſtory no more than a tranſient glance could be beſtowed on them without breaking in on the thread of events more cloſely connected, and without compreſſing the tranſactions within bounds not conſiſtent with their importance.

The general ſtate of the ſouth of France has been deſcribed. The diſtractions in the north and on the coaſts of the ocean, afforded ample opportunities for the machinations of the malcontents. Lyons was unqueſtionally a rendezvous of the royaliſts, although whatever may be laid to the citizens of that place on the ſcore of ſuperſtition, of envy and rivalſhip with Paris, and of that effeminacy and corruption of mind inſeparable from commercial avarice, they muſt be, at leaſt the majority, acquitted of actual hoſtile diſpoſitions againſt their country. The diſtractions of faction at Paris, muſt of neceſſity have unſettled the minds of millions, and the horror excited by the ſanguinary proſcriptions of Robeſpierre muſt in themſelves have conferred a ſhare of odium on the very principles of virtue under the name of which the atrocities were committed. This effect could not be confined to that city; thoſe of Toulon and Marſeilles, were affected by ſimilar diſguſts and fears, and continual anxieties. It was with them difficult to diſcern what would be the ultimate iſſue of circumſtances ſo calamitous.

The royaliſts employed their efforts to aggravate the diſorder, and the important port and arſenal of Toulon, the key of the Mediterranean, was deemed the moſt ſuitable place for the combined operations of the internal and external enemies of the republic. The commiſſioners Albite, Gaſparin, and Salicetti, ſtationed at Marſeilles, ſo early as the twenty-ninth of Auguſt, ſignified to the convention, that the Engliſh ſquadron under admiral Hood was cruiſing in ſight of that port, that he had opened a communication with Toulon, and publiſhed a proclamation addreſſed to the French people, containing propoſals for reſtoring monarchy in France; they alſo ſignified that conſiderable numbers of the Touloneſe had mounted the white cockade; that they admitted an Engliſh frigate into the harbour; and that money was diſtributed plentifully among the inhabitants, and that proviſions, money, and military ſuccours were promiſed by the Engliſh admiral; that he deſired the ſquadron in the harbour to be diſarmed, and the batteries near the ſea to be diſmounted.

Jean Bon St. Andre read an intercepted letter from Toulon, ſtating that the ſections of that city had cloſed with the Engliſh admiral, and that rear-admiral St. Julien had been obliged to fly, having been abandoned by his officers, and finally that eight Engliſh ſhips of war had actually entered the port.

On the ſeventh of September the convention received further advices, that general Brunet and admiral Trugoff had participated in the treaſon of Toulon. The former, however, had been ſeized, ſent to Paris, and referred to the revolutionary tribunal.

It ſoon after appeared that the plot was not confined to Toulon, but was intended to comprehend Marſeilles, and to be extended to all the ſeaports of France. Hood had been cruiſing off the iſlands of Hieres during the month of Auguſt, having on board his fleet, which conſiſted of twenty-one ſail of the line and thirteen frigates beſides cutters, a large number of emigrants and ſome troops, more being expected. On the twenty-fifth of Auguſt he had by means of his emiſſaries laid the foundation of the treachery by a declaration dated the twenty-third, and on the twenty-eighth he landed fifteen hundred men to whom the batteries at the mouth of the harbour were betrayed. The republicans had moved the French fleet into the inner road, and on the twenty-ninth the Engliſh fleet, with the Spaniſh ſquadron under Don John Langara, anchored in the outer road of Toulon.

As the tranſactions of this place continued to form one of the moſt prominent features of the war, and conſiderably influenced the deliberations on the ſubject of peace in 1797, and muſt continue to be objects of the firſt intereſt, a ſuccinct account of the whole is indiſpenſably neceſſary to the accurate comprehenſion of the critical points.

The preliminary declaration of admiral Hood was in the following terms;—"If a capital and explicit declaration in favour of monarchy is made at Toulon and Marſeilles, and the ſtandard of royalty hoiſted, the ſhips in the harbour diſmantled, and the port and forts proviſionally at my diſpoſition, ſo as to allow of the free and ſafe egreſs and regreſs, the people of Provençe ſhall have all the aſſiſtance and ſupport his Britannic majeſty's fleet under my command can give; and not an atom of private property of any individual ſhall be touched, but protected; having no other view than that of reſtoring peace to a great nation upon juſt, liberal, and honorable terms; this muſt be the ground-work of the treaty. And whenever peace takes place, which I hope and truſt will be ſoon, the port, with all the ſhips in the harbor, and fo ts of Toulon, ſhall be reſtored to France, with the ſtores of every kind, agreeable to the ſchedule that m y be delivered. Dated on board the Victory, Auguſt twenty-third, 1793—(Signed)—Hood."

The proclamation addreſſed to the inhabitants of the ſame date, was a mere declamation againſt the revolution, recommending monarchy, and profeſſing the moſt diſintereſted and benevolent regard for the peace and proſperity of France.

The counter-declaration of the general committee of the ſections of Toulon, was founded on the proclamation and declaration of admiral Hood; and contained a ſeries of eight articles in the form of a capitulation, expreſſing the terms of ſurrender; namely, 1. The eſtabliſhment of the conſtitution of 1789, and the acknowledgment of Louis XVII. 2. That the white flag ſhould be hoiſted and the Engliſh fleet meet a friendly reception. 3.

That the ſhips of war in the road ſhould be diſarmed as deſired. 4. That the citadel and forts ſhould be proviſionally at the diſpoſal of the Engliſh admiral, the garriſon to be compoſed of half French half Engliſh, but the command to be in the Engliſh. 5. That the Engliſh ſhould furniſh with ſpeed a force ſufficient to repel the army of Italy and the army of Marſeilles then marching againſt Toulon. 6. That perſons in civil and military appointments ſhould not be removed nor annoyed. 7. That ſubſiſtence and ſuccours ſhould be furniſhed by the allies. 8. That when peace ſhall be re-eſtabliſhed the ſhips and forts put into the hands of the Engliſh ſhould be reſtored to the French nation in the ſame ſtate as when delivered. This was ſigned by the ſeveral perſons in power at Toulon.

The conditions were agreed to and meaſures taken for landing the troops. St. Julien to whom the ſeamen had given command of the fleet, reſiſted the overtures of the ſections, and threatened to oppoſe force; he was however, deſerted by ſeveral of the ſhips, and he determined with his own veſſel and ſix others to fight his way through the enemy rather than betray the fleet. The Engliſh admiral however deemed it more prudent to permit his departure.

After landing a body of troops admiral Hood iſſued another proclamation on the twenty-eighth of Auguſt, as follows—"Whereas the ſections of Toulon, by their commiſſioners to me, have made a ſolemn declaration in favour of monarchy and proclaimed Louis XVII. ſon of the late Louis the XVI, their lawful king, and have ſworn to acknowledge him, and no longer ſuffer the deſpotiſm of the tyrants, which at this time govern France, but will do their utmoſt to eſtabliſh monarchy, as accepted by their late ſovereign in 1789, and reſtore peace to their diſtracted country.

"I do hereby repeat, what I have already declared to the people of the ſouth of France, that I take poſſeſſion of Toulon, and hold it in truſt only for Louis XVII. until peace ſhall be re-eſtabliſhed in France. (Signed) Hood."—

On the firſt of September a fleet of tranſports with a conſiderable body of Spaniſh troops arrived, being part of the army of Rouſillon.

The convention had received detailed particulars of the proceedings at Toulon, which were publiſhed in an official report, the legal adminiſtrators had been depoſed, artillery planted at the doors of ſuch as were deemed faithful to the republic; religious proceſſions of prieſts, nobles, and emigrants were performed in the ſtreets, and the bones of traitors exhibited as the reliques of martyrs to excite the rage of the ignorant; the traitor admiral Trugoff was borne about in triumph; two ſols per day was added to the pay of ſuch of the military as joined them, and intoxication was employed to ſeduce thoſe to perfidy who ſoberly reſiſted, and double rations of wine were daily iſſued; a conſiderable number however ſooner than betray their country had fled and joined general Cartaux who commanded all the ſtrong paſſes near Toulon.

Meaſures had been vigorouſly taken to inveſt Toulon, and Carteaux was ſo active as to open the ſiege immediately after the reduction of the inſurgents at Marſeilles. On the eighth of September Carteaux arrived at the paſſes of Olioulles. The Engliſh with a body of Spaniards had occupied the heights on the right of that poſition, and the royaliſts on the left. As ſoon as the French general was perceived by the enemy, he was ſaluted with a general ſhout of Vive Louis XVII. and a diſcharge of muſquetry. The general ordered the enemy to be attacked about noon, and in about two hours they were completely diſperſed, killing one hundred and fifty and taking a conſiderable number of priſoners, and ſome ſtands of colours. The French loſt only one man and two wounded.

On the firſt of October the republican troops carried the important poſt on the heights of Pharon, which the Engliſh had ſtrongly fortified, and which commanded the city; but after poſſeſſing it a few hours, the republicans were attacked in turn and obliged to abandon it.

Reports had been circulated that two of the repreſentatives of the people, Beauvais and Bayle, had been put to death by the Engliſh in Toulon, which excited the moſt ardent ſpirit of revenge among the troops, and indeed all over France: this effect has been noticed before; however, it ſubſequently appeared that though the repreſentatives had been treated with exceſſive barbarity, that they had eſcaped death.

On the fourteenth an action took place between the garriſon which had marched out to the defence of the redoubt of Malboſquet, and the republicans, in which the former loſt forty and the French thirty men. The Engliſh never made any return of their loſs in this affair. On the next day, two actions took place at the ſame time; the republicans attacking with great bravery the poſt of Cape Brun, and poſſeſſed themſelves of it: a detachment from the garriſon ſent to occupy the heights of Thouars was diſlodged at the ſame time, and compelled to retreat precipitately to the town. The allies loſt in both theſe affairs one hundred men.

The troops of the allies by different convoys that had arrived, now conſiſted of 2000 Engliſh infantry, 2000 Spaniards, 1500 Savoyards, 5000 Neapolitans, 2000 Sclavonians, in all about 10,700 men; further reinforcements of 6000 Spaniards, 6000 Portugueſe, and 2000 Engliſh were expected; and with this force amounting to 25,000 men, it was deſigned to force their way to Aix, and there call the members of the old parliament. Two firſt rates were prepared to proceed to Naples to take on board D'Artois, Monſieur and the biſhop of Toulon. The rope-yard was converted into a ſtable for the Spaniſh cavalry amounting to 1000, and efforts were making to procure horſes to mount a corps of emigrants and other deſerters.

In the latter end of October, general O'Hara arrived from Gibraltar with a body of troops, he being appointed governor of Toulon and commander in chief.

On the fourteenth of November general O'Hara having received inſtructions from England on the concerns of Toulon, which appointed admiral Hood, ſir Gilbert Elliot, and himſelf commiſſioners plenipotentiary for regulating affairs there, a deputation of the inhabitants was deſired to attend them on the twentieth, where the general addreſſed the inhabitants in a written ſpeech, at the concluſion of which he read the declaration of his Britannic majeſty on the circumſtances of the ſurrender of that city and port.

This document in itſelf preſents one of the moſt extraordinary examples of machiavelian policy and breach of faith, that hiſtory can produce; under pretence of a full and general compliance with the conditions under which the place was betrayed into the hands of the Engliſh, it was couched in phraſeology ſo vague and equivocal as to leave it in any caſe diſcretional, whether they ſhould or not ever comply with the ſolemnly pledged faith of the Britiſh king by his repreſentative—It ſtated, that "informed of the circumſtances under which the town, forts, harbour, and ſhipping had been delivered up, his Britannic majeſty thought fit to give a further aſſurance, that when monarchy ſhall be reſtored and a treaty of peace concluded, containing ſtipulations in favour of his majeſty and his allies, reſtitution of all conqueſts made by France during the war, and a juſt indemnification for the loſſes and expences of the war, and a proper ſecurity for the future, then they ſhould be reſtored according to the engagements entered into by admiral Hood!"

The ſame declaration diſclaims any ſupport of the conſtitution of 1789, contrary to what admiral Hood had proclaimed; and that his Britannic majeſty was not ſolicitous to preſcribe any form of government, though he does not heſitate to declare that the eſtabliſhment of the monarchy in the perſon of Louis XVII. and the lawful heirs of the crown, appear to be the beſt, that form of government having prevailed in France from the earlieſt times!

Such a declaration containing ſo groſs and palpable a breach of faith, was not calculated to produce confidence or ſucceſs: the Toulonese openly manifeſted ſome jeolouſy, many deſerted and threw themſelves upon the generoſity of the republicans, and meaſures of rigor became neceſſary on the part of the Engliſh.

On the other hand, admiral Hood found himſelf diſhonored by the conduct of miniſters, who blindly ſecure in the conqueſt of France from the eaſe with which they had gained, that port, unfolded their deſigns, and ſcrupled not to ſacrifice the national honor and the character of a gallant officer, who diſguiſed his feelings, until the ſervice under him was accompliſhed, when he reſigned his command and refuſed to ſerve under miniſters who paid no regard to public faith, or the honor of their repreſentatives.

In the beginning of November Carteaux was removed from the command and put under arreſt for his inactivity, and Dugomier ſucceeded him in the command of the French before Toulon.

Several ſlight actions occurred in the courſe of the month; on the thirtieth the garriſon made a ſally, drove in the French advanced poſts, and took a redoubt; but the French charged them with ſo much impetuoſity, that the enemy were every where beaten and forced to return with precipitation, leaving behind them one thouſand priſoners and two hundred killed and wounded, among the latter general O'Hara the commander in chief, who was ſeverely wounded in the arm.

A ſmall camp of the enemy was alſo ſeized upon with all the tents, baggage, &c. General O'Hara on being taken was extremely faint from loſs of blood, the French ſoldiers treated him with ſo much tenderneſs and brought him ſurgical aſſiſtance ſo ſpeedily that he was induced to make them a preſent of ſixty louis d'ors. The money however was returned to the general with an intimation that "they were contented with the pleaſure they felt in aſſiſting unfortunate humanity." The action was fatal to the hopes of the enemy, and was only the precurſor of the fall of the place.

The commiſſioners with the army purſued their advantage, and not waiting for the arrival of all the troops on their march, determined to attack the town. It was on this occaſion that Buonaparte who has ſince exalted himſelf to the loftieſt rank of illuſtrous men, became diſtinguiſhed for his ſkill and his intrepidity, and here it was that Barras, afterwards one of the directory of France, diſplayed his talents and zeal as a commiſſioner of the convention.

An addreſs from the convention to the army before Toulon at this period produced a ſignal ſpirit of enthuſiaſm; it ſaid—"Too long have you deferred the national vengeance, too long have you poſtponed your own glory; our enemies brave us, tyranny threatens us, and you continue quiet ſpectators of this diſgraceful ſight. Is it becauſe you have ceaſed to exiſt, that they ſtill live? Before your eyes floats the ſtandard of royaliſm, defies your courage, and hides from your view the Mediterranean! Has the tricolor flag then loſt its hues? Is it no longer capable of rallying the defenders of the country? Will you ſuffer France and Europe to ſay to you in future—the republic commanded them to conquer, and they were afraid to die?"

The enthuſiaſm of the commiſſioners Salicetti, Ricord, Freron, Robeſpierre junior, and Barras, correſponded with that of the convention, and was ſoon communicated to the troops. It was determined to attack the out-poſts poſſeſſed by the Engliſh, at the ſame time that the whole of the batteries ſhould pour their thunder on the town at every point likely to produce diſorder and confuſion.

The diviſion under general Lepoype with Barras, attacked the heights of Pharon on the ſixteenth in three columns, which was carried with the utmoſt intrepidity, and eighty priſoners with a lieutenant colonel taken. In this action ſome emiſſaries of the enemy had endeavoured to excite diſtraction by crying out "fly, treachery, ſave yourſelves;" but by the conduct of the general and the ardour of the troops, the republican flag was ſoon diſplayed. Mean while the principal object of attack was fort Mulgrave, which commanded the forts of l'Eguillette and Ballaguier, which was defended by three thouſand men, twenty pieces of cannon, and ſeveral mortars; the enemy had exhauſted all the reſources of art and nature to render it impregnable, however it was attacked by the commander in chief Dugomier with the general Laborde at five o'clock on the morning of the eighteenth, and at ſix the republican flag was flying on the ramparts. The French loſt two hundred killed and five hundred wounded; the allies loſt the whole garriſon, of whom only five hundred were priſoners, including a Neapolitan prince. Here alſo the royaliſt emiſſaries had found means to introduce themſelves among the republican troops, and endeavoured to excite diſmay; but at the rallying ſounds of liberty and the republic, the ſoldiers flew to victory; and the forts of l'Eguillette and Ballaguier were alſo carried by aſſault; the former was defended by a double encloſure, a camp entrenched with hedges, conſiſting of chevaux de frieſe, abbatis, bridges, thirteen cannon, thirty-ſix and twenty-four pounders, and five mortars, with five thouſand choſen troops, and ſupported by the traverſe fire of three other redoubts, containing three thouſand men.

Diſmay and terror now ſpread through the city of Toulon, and the cannonade which was inceſſantly kept up in every direction, aggravated the terror and conſternation of the allies and the traitors who had betrayed the place to them. The forts of Malboſquet and Pommet next fell, and the troops from every out-poſt took refuge in the city, the gates of which were ſhut, and ſuch meaſures taken as to prevent every communication between the town and the beſiegers, except by the mouths of their cannon. This ſtep was taken to cover the precipitate flight and embarkation of the allies and the traitors. Meaſures were taken for removing the ſhips from the harbour to the outer roads, and out of the reach of ſhot and ſhells which the republicans inceſſantly poured upon them. The bombardment was continued till ten o'clock at night, the ſcaling-ladders were already applied to the walls, and four thouſand ſhells ready to be thrown to cover the ſtorm, when it was found that the enemy had fled, after ſpiking all the cannon. So precipitate, however, was the flight that above twelve thouſand priſoners fell into the hands of the republicans, a conſiderable number of oxen, ſheep, hogs, and large quantities of forage and proviſions of all ſorts, beſides ſeveral pieces of Engliſh cannon.

The whole of the republican army marched in triumphantly at ſeven o'clock in the morning, after five days and five nights of inceſſant combat and fatigue. Their conduct was a ſingular contraſt to that of the departing friends of Toulon, whoſe ſailors and ſoldiers were ſuffered to plunder the city, and to vent their rage on the houſes and property of thoſe, who had under all the diſaſters of Toulon and the treachery of their fellow citizens continued faithful to their country. A proclamation was iſſued by general Dugomier, declaring the puniſhment of death on any perſons found in acts of pillage, and reſerving for the law alone the puniſhment of traitors.

The retreat of the allies was as diſgraceful as their mode of entrance. That city which was entered upon profeſſions of friendſhip, and thoſe ſhips which were to be kept only as a depoſit to be reſtored to France at a peace, were ſet on fire in ſeveral places; the fire in the town was ſoon extinguiſhed; but the allies blew up ſeveral of the ſhips and ſet fire to the arſenals, rope houſes, maſt houſes, and magazines of timber. The Themiſtocles of ſeventy-four guns, which had been converted into a priſon ſhip by the Engliſh, they ſet fire to, with all the priſoners in it, but by the exertions of the republicans they found means to eſcape in boats or by ſwimming, except a few who were in fetters and who periſhed in the exploſion. We have it on the authority of admiral Hood himſelf, that a ſettled arrangement had been made for deſtroying all the ſhips and the arſenal, but that it was only prevented from being completely accompliſhed by the ſuddeneſs of their retreat. Sir Sydney Smith, who at a ſubſequent period was captured by the French and kept in cloſe confinement for his incendiary conduct at this place, was the principal perſon in ſpreading the conflagration.

The French account of the ſhipping deſtroyed and ſaved was as follows:— Veſſels remaining in the port, thirteen ſhips of the line,—one of 120 guns, three of 80, nine of 74, and one on the ſtocks, and five lighters.

Burnt, nine of the line, three frigates, and one careening pontoon.

Carried off by the enemy, three of the line, five frigates, two ſloops of war, three lighters and a brig. Theſe ſhips of the line were, the Commerce de Marſeilles commanded by the traitor admiral Trugoff, the Puiſſant, and Pompee.

To the Spaniſh admiral had been entruſted the taſk of ſcuttling ſeveral veſſels in order to ſink them in the harbour, but they ſet fire to the Iris frigate on board of which were ſeveral barrels of gunpowder, the exploſion of which deſtroyed two Engliſh gun-boats. The Montreal another frigate ſerving as a powder magazine was alſo blown up.

The general magazines of pitch, tar, tallow, oil, and the hemp magazines were all ſet on fire by one train; but the effect was not equal to the preparations made; the maſt houſe was burnt, but the timber magazine was ſaved by the activity of the people of the yards, but particularly of ſome hundreds of the galley ſlaves, moſt of whom had continued in chains from before the revolution, theſe had extricated themſelves, and ſaved the hemp-houſe completely. The powder magazine of Cape Brun and Fort Pommet had been blown up on the eighteenth. But no ſtone powder magazine was effected; they were preſerved by the active intrepidity of the troops, who broke off the communication of the trains, even while the exploſion was ſpreading.

While the work of deſtruction was going on and the town on fire, the fugitives were embarking with the utmoſt impatience; ſeveral chaloupes with them on board were ſunk in the harbour by the fire from the batteries, which the republicans had taken poſſeſſion of. Vaſt numbers continued to croud to the ſhores, with the hope of eſcaping, and demanding that protection of the Britiſh Crown which had been ſolemnly pledged to them. A ſcene of riot plunder and confuſion enſued, and continued till morning, and though the utmoſt efforts had been made to embark all the fugitives and troops, only ſix thouſand of the latter could be brought off, while thouſands of the betrayed inhabitants were left on the ſhore a prey to the vengeance of their injured country. Many of them plunged into the ſea, and made vain efforts to reach the ſhips by ſwimming, others were ſeen to ſhoot themſelves in the wildeſt phrenſy of deſpair. While the flames of the ſurrounding conflagration, the roar of bombs and the clamour of the croud, rendered the dark ſtillneſs of the night prodigiouſly terrible.

This is but a faint deſcription of the ſcene on ſhore, and it was ſcarcely leſs dreadful on board of the ſhips. Loaded with the moſt heterogeneous mixture of all nationss, with aged men and infants, as well as women; with the ſick from all the hoſpitals, and with the mangled ſoldiers from the poſts juſt deſerted, their wounds ſtill undreſt; nothing could equal the horrors of the ſight, except the ſtill more appaling cries of diſtraction and agony that filled the ear, for huſbands, fathers, children, left on ſhore.

To increaſe the diſtreſs, they were without ſufficient proviſions for this mixed and helpleſs multitude of human beings; and ſuch as they had were almoſt unfit for uſe.

Of the thirty-one ſhips of the line which the Engliſh found at Toulon, thirteen were left behind, nine were burnt at Toulon, and one at Leghorn; and four lord Hood had previouſly ſent away to the French ports Breſt and Rochfort, with five thouſand republican ſeamen, whom he was afraid to truſt. Great-Britain therefore obtained, by an immenſe profuſion of blood and treaſure which the Toulon expedition coſt, only three ſhips of the line and five frigates, which were all that lord Hood was able to carry away.

The war on the ſide of Spain was productive of nothing but petty ſkirmiſhes, not worth detailing; and on the ſide of Savoy the king of Sardinia appears to have made but a ſlow progreſs in recovering his poſſeſſions, which the Britiſh miniſtry was ſo generous as to guarantee to him at an immenſe expence. The Piedmonteſe were repulſed in attempting to penetrate between Mourienne and Briançonnais. The republicans ſaw them fall from the top of the mountains, and carried their redoubts with the bayonet. The city of Cluz was then in the hands of the French, and they were proceeding to Salons. In the mean time an Engliſh veſſel arrived at Nice with a flag of truce, and a proclamation to the inhabitants, exhorting them to accept the royal conſtitution of 1789; but the magiſtrates of Nice replied, that French republicans would never become ſlaves, and that no other anſwer would be made to royaliſts except from the mouths of cannon.

While the republic was thus ſtruggling with mighty efforts againſt the hoſts of internal and external enemies and aſſaſſins, her colonies were involved in calamities equally extraordinary. Early in the year the iſland of Martinico continued in an unquiet and divided ſtate. It appears to be a neceſſary conſequence of a toleration of ſlavery in any ſhape, and under any qualifications, to gradually undermine the virtues, and liberty itſelf. In the Weſt-Indies, where the labours of the unfortunate and betrayed African, not only ſupplied the wants, and pampered all the luxeries of the European, the inexperience of toil and the apprehenſion of any alteration in his condition, by principles that would reduce him to the neceſſity of perſonal labour, or the abridgement of his ſupernumerary indulgencies, would render him hoſtile to them, and diſpoſed to ſupport that ſyſtem of civil coercion which would beſt ſecure their enjoyments. Hence a majority of the white inhabitants of all the colonies of every country are tyrants in epitome, and thoſe of France though always more humane to their ſlaves than any other nation under heaven, were ſtill decided advocates for royalty.

On the contrary that love of freedom ſo inherent in human nature, appearing in ſo many forms in every ſtate, civilized or ſavage, muſt have been as conſpicious on the part of the Africans and their deſcendant. Hence the negroes, and all thoſe under the name of people of colour, who are deſcended in any degree from an admixture of African blood, were as decided republicans. Unlike the ſlaves in the colonies of every other nation, thoſe of France had better means of information; that urbanity which has ſo long characteriſed the French people, and which has been conſidered as only an artful and inſinuating mode of behaviour, has been found among their ſlaves to be a real diſpoſition of the heart, cultivated by education and improved by the gratification which the exerciſe of it beſtows. Independent of a careful religious inſtruction, and of that unreſtrained ſociality which the French maſter maintained with his ſlaves, they had the means of disfranchiſement in their own power by extraordinary induſtry; and the philanthrophic ſpirit of the age had been ſtudious to make experiments on their capacity for the acquirement of ſcience and letters. Such circumſtances muſt have rendered the ſlaves in the French colonies more ſuſceptible of that equal diſtribution of rights, which the convention had decreed to be extended to them during the period that the Gironde party retained the reins of adminiſtration.

Polverel and Santhonax, had been ſent to St. Domingo, with full powers from the convention to extend freedom to the ſlaves, by a wholeſome regulation which would gradually operate to the happineſs of the enfranchiſed and the ſecurity of thoſe who had been their bond maſters. But unhappily, this moderation was unſuitable to the views of the planters, who already wrought upon by emigrants and emiſſaries of England, determined to ſhake off the authority which would wound their pride, by reducing them to a level with thoſe whom they had been habituated to conſider as legal and purchaſable property.

We have before noticed the convulſions that took place in the iſlands. Every oppoſition of the whites became a ſource of conflict, which at length terminated in the maſſacre of many, and the expulſion of the greater number of them. The wretched exiles thus the victims of their cupidity and imprudence, in their flight fell a prey to thoſe who had been moſt inſtrumental in encouraging them to obſtinacy and treaſon againſt their country. Britiſh ſhips of war cruiſing in the neighbourhood plundered the unhappy fugitives, and happy were thoſe thouſands of both ſexes who were enabled to obtain an aſylum on the hoſpitable ſhores of the United States of America.

The machinations of the Britiſh extended to every one of the French iſlands. Private emiſſaries, and public bribes, ſeduction and threats, armies and fleets combined to expel the French from all their colonies. But virtuous intentions ſo rarely actuating political deſigns, and which are not always ſo ſucceſsful as they ſhould be, proved to be the ſole and effectual ſalvation of the French colonies. The blacks and their deſcendants, attached to the government that extended to them the equal rights ordained by providence, returned for this juſtice the moſt inflexible and magnanimous loyalty.

The iſland of Tobago however, was taken by an Engliſh ſquadron under the command of admiral Laforey in the beginning of April; and profiting by the ſtruggle between the royaliſts and republicans in Martinico, admiral Gardner attempted a deſcent upon that iſland alſo; he landed three thouſand men; but the republican party had diſcomfited the royaliſts, before he could effect any operation, and he was obliged to reembark his troops with the utmoſt precipitation, to ſave them from that deſtruction with which thoſe were purſued who invited him thither.

Upon the fall of the Gironde, however, thoſe of the coloniſts who made their eſcape to France, had acted with ſo much induſtry among the party in power, as to produce an impeachment of Polverel and Santhonax in the convention on the ſixteenth of July. The ſubſequent changes and the overthrow of Robeſpierre rendered this decree nugatory; and the ſpirit of the firſt decree was religiouſly maintained.

The Engliſh however continued their ſecret manœuvres, and had already laid the foundation of a conſpiracy which was to put into their hands ſeveral of the French colonies. In the begining of October the royaliſts of Fort Jeremie, in St. Domingo, had invited the Engliſh to take poſſeſſion of that iſland, and Cape Nicola Mole ſubmitted in a few days after.

The operations of the Engliſh were in the year 1794, attended with further ſucceſſes, which we ſhall notice. The phrenzy that pervaded the politics of the nation was extended to every part of ſociety; and as from overthrow of deſpotiſm to obtain liberty, fanaticiſm had produced almoſt an anarchy; ſo in diſguſt with the abuſes of religion and the vices and treachery of prieſts, they ran into the extreme of irreligion. It muſt be acknowledged, however, that this phrenzy was but limited and temporary; that although there were a few whoſe ſcepticiſm was confeſſed, and more who doubted only becauſe they had heard ſome celebrated philoſopher had done ſo likewiſe; thoſe who doubted upon reaſoning were generally moral, while thoſe of the other deſcription might be conſidered as mad. On the ſeventh of November, ſeveral eccleſiaſtics both catholic and proteſtant, among whom were Gobet biſhop of Paris and his vicars, entered the convention and ſolemnly reſigned their functions, acknowledging that their religious inſtitutions were calculated only to controul the vulgar. One prieſt declared that prieſts of all religions were impoſtors more or leſs, that there were ſome who from want of capacity or reflection believed a great deal, but that one and all profeſſed more than they believed; that in ſhort prieſts partook very much of the nature of the mountebank.

This ſpirit prevailed for ſeveral days, but although for the moment the overthrow of prejudice was received with applauſe; the majority of the convention, and the people very generally, apprehended that the more ſolid principles of morality and virtue, which had been for ſeveral ages gradually incorporating with nummery and pageantry, would be mingled in a common ruin. The reſentment of the people of Paris was particularly excited by an intolerant decree of that commune, ordering the churches to be ſhut up; but on the firſt of December they were compelled to reverſe that decree, and Barrere from the committee of public ſafety produced a decree, which was adopted, proclaiming the freedom of religious worſhip. Among thoſe frequent but ſtill lamentable, becauſe they are too powerful artifices of great villains, is that of addreſſing the popular feelings by the countenance and ſupport of their prejudices; religion in France, and taking the majority of every country, conſiſts in little more than an accordance with certain periodical cuſtoms, and in an adoption of certain tenets upon the credit of thoſe by whom they were taught; and as to futurity, it is a ſentiment of fear not to believe, rather than an actual adoption of truth from a well digeſted and reaſonable conviction; this was particularly the caſe in France, but that fear not to believe was a ſentiment upon which the broadeſt baſis of popularity was to be laid; Cromwell had acted upon it with a degree of ſucceſs that ought to teach mankind a perpetual ſuſpicion of violent religious declaimers; but Robeſpierre knew too well how feeble the impreſſion is which is communicated by remote example, however ſtriking, and upon this he laid the foundation of a power with the people, which promiſed, even in ſpite of the murders he was committing, a ſecurity againſt the moſt potent meaſures of his rivals; he ſtood forth the advocate of the divinity, and the people did not ſee his ſoul bathed in the blood of the virtuous.

Such was the ſtate of France at the cloſe of the year 1793. We have ſeen her amidſt all her afflictions and diſaſters, torn in the body of her ſenate, convulſed by an unexampled civil war, attacked by all the powers of Europe, one of her principal ſea-ports delivered into the hands of her moſt inveterate enemy, and her finances and her circulating medium undermined by every effort of induſtry and intrigue.

It may be uſeful then, ere we enter upon the tranſactions of the year 1794, to advert briefly to the conduct of the allied powers, and to preſent ſuch an outline of their meaſures as will leave the mind to form its own concluſions on the conduct and conſiſtency of the rival powers, and upon their probable ſucceſs.

We have ſeen in the principles and deſigns of the treaty of Pilnitz, the actual cauſe of the general war; and in the events that followed the declaration, the means by which it was to be conducted by the allied powers. The retreat of the Pruſſians and the treachery of their conqueror; the open junction of England in the confederacy, and the French armies compelled to evacuate not only Holland but Flanders, that had been ſo rapidly conquered. At this period the declaration of the prince of Cobourg on the fifth of April, 1793, proclaimed in the face of all Europe, that the only deſign of the emperor and allies was to give France a conſtitutional king and the conſtitution which ſhe had formed for herſelf, that ſuch places as might be put into his hands ſhould be deemed only as ſacred depoſits; and in four days after with the moſt conſummate and ſhameleſs effrontery he publiſhed a declaration, annulling all that he had pledged his honor to obſerve in his former proclamation.

On the twenty-third of Auguſt lord Hood declared to the people of Toulon that he had no other view than to reſtore peace to the French nation, and the conſtitution of 1789; he accepted the terms of their ſurrender on the twenty-eighth, by his proclamation, and ſolemnly daclared that he had taken poſſeſſion of the place in truſt only.

Yet it is remarkable that on the twenty-fifth of January 1793, Auckland the ambaſſador at Holland, deſcribed this conſtitution thus ſupported by Hood, and proclaimed by Cobourg, as the work of "certain miſcreants" &c.—and yet the Engliſh government not only retained their miniſter at Paris during the exerciſe of the authority under the conſtitution of 1789, and continued to negociate and treat under it, until the month of Auguſt 1792; when the Engiſh miniſter was recalled.

On the twenty-ninth of October, 1793, the king of England's miniſters declared that all they wanted was a ſtable government in France, yet the king of Sardinia was ſubſidized by this power to defend his own dominions; while the king of Pruſſia, who in the month of July 1793, was to act as above mentioned, about the cloſe of the year applied for a ſubſidy from England (and obtained it on the nineteenth of April 1794,) in order to ſecure this co-operation.

The year 1793 produced ſeveral other events which were not developed till the following year; among theſe, ſeveral treaties, the deſign and importance of which render a notice of them eſſential to this hiſtory. The foundation of the policy of theſe treaties, is to be found in that ſource of affliction, diſgrace, and diſaſter the convention of Pilnitz —the exiſtence of which had been queſtioned in the early part of the war, but which was acknowledged in the courſe of debate in the year 1794, by a member of the Britiſh parliament in the confidence of that government.*

A treaty or convention was concluded between Great Britain and the empreſs of Ruſſia on the twenty-fifth of March, 1793—which ſtipulated, the ſhutting all their ports againſt the ſhips of France, and prohibited the exportation in any caſe from their ports, of military or naval ſtores, corn, grain, ſalt-meat or other proviſions for France; and to take all other meaſures in their power for injuring the commerce of France, and for bringing her by ſuch means to conditions of peace: the fourth article ſtipulates—That their majeſties engage to unite all their efforts to prevent other powers, not implicated in this war, from giving, on this occaſion of common concern to every civilized ſtate, any protection whatever, directly or indirectly, in conſequence of their neutrality to the commerce or property of the French on the ſea, or in the ports of France.

A treaty was formed on the fourth of April of the ſame year, with the landgrave of Heſſe Caſſel ſtipulating for eight thouſand troops, infantry, cavalry and chaſſeurs, completely equipped for the field. The price of theſe troops was fixed at eighty crowns banco for every horſeman, mounted; the foot ſoldiers thirty crowns banco, each crown counted at four ſhillings and nine pence three farthings, Engliſh money! beſide a ſubſidy of 225,000 crowns per annum.—And a proviſion was made that they might be employed in Great Britain or Ireland. Proviſion was alſo made for killed, and wounded, and recruits in lieu of them were to be furniſhed at twelve crowns a head.

A treaty between the king of Sardinia and Great-Britain, wherein the former ſtipulates to keep five thouſand men for the defence of his own dominions, as well as to act againſt the common enemy; and the latter was to pay a ſubſidy of two hundred thouſand pounds per annum in punctual quarterly inſtalments, beſide keeping a fleet in the Mediterranean to co-operate therewith.—This treaty alſo guaranteed all the then poſſeſſions of the king of Sardinia, and the reſtitution of all that belonged to him at the commencement of the war, and of ſuch as he might in the courſe of the war obtain poſſeſſion. This was concluded on the twenty-fifth of April 1793.

A treaty between his Britannic majeſty and the king of Spain, engaging to act in perfect concert and to make a common cauſe in the war; to convoy the ſhips of each other, to ſhut their ports againſt the French; not to permit warlike ſtores, wheat, or other grain, ſalted meat, or other proviſions to be exported from their ports to France, and to take every other means in their power to diſtreſs the trade of France and to reduce her by that means to juſt conditions of peace. By the fifth article which is exactly a tranſcript of the fourth of the Ruſſian treaty—They declare the preſent war to be intereſting to every civilized ſtate, and that they will unite to prevent thoſe powers which do not take part in the ſaid war, from affording in conſequence of their neutrality, any protection direct or indirect on the ſeas or in the ports of France, to the commerce and property of the French. This treaty was concluded on the twenty-fifth of May, 1793, at Aranjuez.

A treaty between the kings of England and the two Sicilies, which ſtates that being convinced of the common dangers which threatened Europe from the principles adopted in France, they agree to make a common cauſe, guarantee each others dominions; the latter to ſupply ſix thouſand troops, four ſhips of the line, four frigates, and four ſmall ſhips of war; as ſoon as the troops leave the dominions of Sicily the ſubſiſtence and forage to be provided by the former power. Dated at Naples, twelfth of July, 1793.

A convention between the Engliſh and Pruſſian kings, concluded in the camp before Mentz, the fourteenth of July, 1793, which beſide recapitulating the cauſes for a renewal of the alliance and the motives of the war, the fourth article is an exact copy of the fourth of the Ruſſian and the fifth of the Spaniſh, for coercing neutral powers.

Another convention with the emperor, the third article of which is alſo an exact copy of the fourth of the Ruſſian and Pruſſian, and the fifth of the Spaniſh treaties. It is dated at London, Auguſt the tenth, 1793.

A treaty between the Engliſh king and the margrave of Baden, for a body of ſeven hundred and fifty-four troops of the latter to ſerve againſt France; conditions the ſame as with Heſſe.

A treaty of England with Portugal for making a common cauſe againſt France, dated the twenty-eighth of September, 1793.

A treaty with Heſſe Darmſtadt, for three thouſand troops on the ſame conditions as thoſe of Heſſe Caſſel, dated at Langen Candel, the fifth of October, 1793.

Theſe tranſactions exhibit a combination of deſigns, a prodigality of ſacrifices, and an inveteracy of hatred, the moſt violent and terrible that any age or nation has ever manifeſted. The fourth article of the Ruſſian treaty, perhaps in the atrocity of conception and the univerſal tyranny of its intention, ſurpaſſes every thing ancient and modern. The uſurpations of imperial Rome and the rapacious tyranny of Barbary, the inroads of the Saracens, and the Goths and Vandals, and the predatory marauding of the Normans and the Danes, may find a colour and excuſe in the ignorance and barbariſm of their ſeveral periods—but in the attempt to force neutral nations, nations living in peace, cheriſhing virtue, and cultivating all the arts uſeful to the comfort and freedom of man, from their happy condition into a war, wherein not only they had no concern, but whoſe intereſts were concerned in avoiding every colour of hoſtility, was left for an age of refinement, for nations profeſſing chriſtianity and warring for civilization!

The Britiſh ambaſſador (Daniel Hailes) at Copenhagen, entered into a correſpondence with the count Bernſtorff miniſter of that cabinet, upon the propriety of entering into the armed confederacy againſt France; but with a dignity and candour that has immortaliſed that ſtateſman, he not only repelled every ſuggeſtion that was urged, but ſhewed to the ſatisfaction of the world the propriety of preſerving an inviolable and impartial neutrality.

The republic of Genoa poſſeſſed large property in France, her weakneſs beſide pointed out the prudence of avoiding every hoſtile meaſure againſt a neighbour ſo formidable; notwithſtanding this, Mr. Drake, then the Britiſh envoy at that ſtate, peremptorily inſiſted upon an immediate and unqualified declaration of hoſtilities againſt France. This ſpirited though ſmall republic was not to be bullied out of her neutrality, and an Engliſh ſhip of war in defiance of the law of nations entered her port, fired into a French veſſel lying under the protection of the Genoeſe flag, and killed about forty of the crew.

At Florence the Engliſh envoy, lord Hervey. undertook not only to intimidate the grand duke of Tuſcany out of his neutrality, by obliging him to ſend away De la Flotte the French ambaſſador, in twenty-four hours; but alſo dictated internal regulations concerning the French remaining in Tuſcany, as particulars inſiſted upon by the Britiſh Cabinet. This conduct was the more ſingular in the preſent caſe, from the circumſtance that the grand duke was the brother of the emperor, the ally of England and the firſt power that engaged in war againſt France. This conduct left Tuſcany no alternative between a war with either party, and after repeated ſtruggles to ſupport the neutrality ſo eſſential to its proſperity, the grand duke was at length reduced to a declaration of war on the tenth of October, againſt France.

Tuſcany felt the afflictions of this foreign influence, at a ſubſequent period, when the French triumphant in Italy expelled the Engliſh indignantly from that territory, but generouſly allowed Tuſcany to reaſſume its neutrality, without even inflicting on it that vengeance which might have been juſtified by the rights of conqueſt and the laws of war.

On the thirtieth of November, 1793, lord Robert Stephen Fitzgerald, the Engliſh miniſter in Switzerland, addreſſed a moſt inflammatory letter to the ſtates, in which he ſays, he "thinks himſelf bound to expreſs his indignation at the outrage committed againſt them by thoſe vile and ferocious men aſſembled at Paris under the name of the convention; who not being able to corrupt the brave Swiſs in the ſervice of his moſt chriſtian majeſty, and deſpairing to make them accomplices in their robberies, diſarmed, ſtripped, and murdered them. Europe will never forget the noble ſacrifice of ſo many generous Swiſs, who died defending Louis XVI. It will never forget the cruelties which thoſe cannibals made them ſuffer!" After a long-continued and uniform invective of this temper, he wiſhes to inſinuate that the French meant to ſurpriſe the Swiſs in the moment of ſecurity, and overthrow their government alſo, and then continues—"The miniſter of his Britannic majeſty will not decide, whether juſtice, and the true intereſts of a ſtate, permit it to remain neuter, againſt thoſe who would reduce them to barbariſm; in a war of almoſt all the powers of Europe; in a war, where not only the exiſtence of every eſtabliſhed government, but even that of all property is at ſtake." Beſtowing on them the titles of the enemies of god and man, atheiſts, working for blood and pillage, he concludes with a profeſſion of the attachment of his court.

The agents of the Helvetic body replied to this letter—and after profeſſions of eſteem they ſay—"However afflicting the remembrance of thoſe terrible events in France (which your excellency has brought to our recollection) and the ſad fate of our brethren who ſuffered ſo unfortunately may be, yet our grief muſt nevertheleſs yield to the principles of our conſtitution: the principle has laſted for ſeveral centuries on the relations of peace, amity, and good neighbourhood with all the ſurrounding powers. Accuſtomed to obſerve ſcrupulouſly all engagements entered into, we will neither wander from our declared neutrality, on any pretence whatever, nor will we liſten to any inſinuation which might give riſe to juſt complaints."

Letters ſimilar to that to the Swiſs, the Britiſh cabinet addreſſed to every independent neutral ſtate in Europe, and even to the United States of America. The ſingular ſecrecy that has veiled the proceedings of the American government, has completely ſecluded from the public eye, letters addreſſed to the American executive by lord Grenville, which however have been treated of by political writers on the continent of Europe. They are ſaid to have contained aſſurances of a knowledge on the part of the Britiſh government, that the rulers of France had determined to overthrow the American conſtitution; that they had ſent emiſſaries to America, to ſow hatred of that conſtitution on account of its reſemblance to the conſtitution of England; and concluded with aſſurances of the greateſt readineſs on the part of England to lend her aid by fleets or armies at any time, to preſerve her government from the threatened inroads of anarchy and atheiſm. Theſe reports however, are not ſo authentic as to deſerve the moſt implicit credit for their correctneſs, though little doubt has been entertained that a correſpondence on ſubjects of this nature had been exchanged in 1793—between the Engliſh and the American governments.

But the principle that dictated the treaty with Ruſſia alſo was not confined in its conſequences to the European ſtates; the riſing empire of America, whoſe exiſtence, freedom, and proſperity was a perpetual ſatire upon the government and policy of England; and a ſecret and conſtant cauſe of envy and diſquietude; theſe ſtates producing ſo many of the articles of firſt neceſſity, and extending her commerce under the benign influence of popular government, to the remoteſt corners of the earth, was a principal object of apprehenſion to England, whoſe power and conſideration in the world, is founded on that commercial dominion which ſhe has maintained ſo long at the expence of every other people.

The United States had derived from France in the ſtruggle for her liberty, aid ſo effectual as to baffle all the tyrannical deſigns of England, for the enſlavement of the new world. A treaty of friendſhip dictated by generoſity and gratitude had bound the Americans to France, and had, as was cuſtomary with nations between whom obligations of the firſt importance had ariſen, given to the latter the title in form and fact of the moſt favoured nation in the American ports.

A nation poſſeſſing ſuch reſources, ſo attached, was a powerful obſtacle to the views of thoſe who wiſhed to blot France from the map of Europe. But the ſituation of France while it rendered her peculiarly in need of the friendly aid of her ally, rendered it out of her power ſhould her ally be attacked, to give her that aid which on a former occaſion had ſealed her independence. The Engliſh cabinet knew the weakneſs of France. They knew the actual condition of America, and they determined to effect the deſtruction of the treaties between France and her, by force and cunning, and to accompliſh the annihilation of France and republican government in defiance of all faith, and to the ſacrifice of all principles of ſubſtantial juſtice and univerſal law.

On the ſixth of November, 1703, an order of the Britiſh cabinet was ſecretly iſſued to their ſhips of war—in the following words:—

"George Rex—Additional inſtructions to the commanders of all ſhips of war and privateers, that have or may have letters of marque againſt France. Given at St. James's the ſixth day of November, 1793, in the thirty-fourth year of our reign.

"That they ſhall ſtop and detain all ſhips laden with goods the produce of any colony belonging to France, or carrying proviſions or other ſupplies for the uſe of ſuch colony, and ſhall bring the ſame with their cargoes to legal adjudication in our courts of admiralty.

By his majeſty's command, (Signed) Dundas."

The conſequences of this order were the ſeizure of a vaſt number of American veſſels, and a conſequent remonſtrance from the American government. In the courſe of this hiſtory we ſhall have to mark the conſequences of that ſyſtem which appears to have been firſt publicly put into operation in the treaty with Ruſſia in March, 1793, and firſt publicly acted upon by England in the order of November of the ſame year.

Such was the political conduct of the allies; we have before noticed the military folly that guided the attack on the iron frontier of France. Greater ability perhaps was never diſplayed than France now exhibited in every department of war, finance, and public inſtitutions; a campaign which commenced under the moſt inauſpicious circumſtances, was terminated every where with ſignal and unqualified triumph; in the centre of the nation the civil war of La Vendée was cruſhed, the Pruſſians defeated and driven from the banks of the Rhine, the Auſtrians on the Moſelle, the Engliſh from Toulon, and the Spaniards in the face of their own territory, the Sardinians driven from their populous cities, and the number, valour, and experience of the republicans augmenting daily, and producing from obſcurity, men, whoſe ſplendid genius and ſucceſs have elevated them to the firſt places in the hiſtory of military heroiſm.

The triumphs of the republic and of liberty were diſplayed at the ſame moments at the gates of Italy and Germany—on the ſhores of the Atlantic and the Mediterranean.

At Toulon valour and enthuſiaſm under Dugoumier were paramount over the combined forces of the allies, and officers of the moſt approved military ſkill and acknowleged bravery, At Landau, ſteadineſs, patience, and intrepidity united under Hoche. At Toulon the climate was favourable to the ſoldier and mitigated the fatigue of a winter campaign. At Landau the ardour of battle was diſplayed amidſt the ſnow and rigour of the frozen North.

In the South victory reſembled the productions of the climate quick and overwhelming; in the North vigorous but ſlow, arriving at maturity by invincible patience.

In all views preſenting a wonderful example of the power of a nation acting under the grand impulſes of liberty; refuting thoſe abſurd ſuggeſtions of the hiſtorians of monarchy, who have ſaviſhly copied the prejudices of the long enſlaved and enervated Italians, that the French valour was but a momentary impetuoſity. The hiſtorians of the republic, and of thoſe nations who have been oppoſed to her, have learned important leſſons, and poſterity will look back with wonder at the blindneſs of thoſe who preceded the republic, and the raſhneſs of thoſe who have ſo vainly oppoſed her.

A. D. [1794.] The utility of hiſtory depends upon the fidelity, accuracy, and regard for truth, with which facts are diſplayed; upon the candour and intelligence with which cauſes and motives are inveſtigated, and the ſprings of human actions laid open. All human knowledge is experience, and hiſtory is philoſophy delivering its leſſons, for the uſe of nations and for poſterity.

America fortunately yet enjoys that enviable ſtation in which her citizen if ſwayed by no mercenary intereſts, nor baſely ſervile to the vices of faction, may confidently lay the moſt ſubſtantial claim to diſintereſtedneſs in narrating thoſe momentous events from which ſhe is ſo remote, but which ſo largely influence the fate of mankind.

In tracing the events of the revolution in France, the acknowledgment of difficulty has been already made, which occurs in unfolding the true cauſes of events in themſelves are liable to obſcurity, born as it were in confuſion, and claiming their birth from countleſs ſources. This difficulty muſt exiſt until thoſe halcyon days return to France, under which the unobſerved but obſerving eye of philoſophy ſhall open to the views of the world, many of thoſe hidden cauſes, which the conflicts of war and the prudence of patriotiſm yet retain undivulged.

From the materials that publicity and cloſe obſervation have furniſhed, this hiſtory ſprings, and no facts are produced for which there are not approved and reaſonable evidence. The agitations of party, preſent the moſt difficult ſubjects in which the revolution is involved, becauſe they are fraught with contradictions. The uniform profeſſions of all parties if believed, would lead to an opinion of their common innocence and integrity. And their denunciations of each other, if credited, would lead to a concluſion of their common and incorrgible profligacy.

But it cannot be too conſtantly conſidered, that all parties are compoſed of individuals, actuated by motives frequently the moſt oppoſite; ſubject to prejudices, weakneſſes, hatreds, fears, envy, and other malignant paſſions; and that in this anomaly of characters and paſſions, it is not extraordinary, if we find much incoherency, and great inconſiſtency. If we find, however, amidſt this combuſtion of paſſions that great principles are regarded, truth reſpected, and virtue revered. We have only to enquire in what degree and by whom precept has gone hand in hand with practice, in order to form an accurate judgment of the actors in the ſubject of enquiry.

Frequently the characters of men afford the beſt illuſtration of events in which they are concerned; as from actions we learn to eſtimate characters. The Gironde who had promoted the depoſition of the king, in concert with Danton, had been deſirous of reſting there and founding the republic in peace. The ſecond of Sepember had erected a new tyrant, whoſe power though not yet viſible in the individual, was exerciſed progreſſively from the influence of fe r over ſeparate individuals, and by jealouſies fomented in the convention until it obtained the ſevereſt tenſion of general terror. The Gironde had given arms and power to the commune of Paris, to create an ally againſt this terror; men poſſeſſed of power, whether they are of the great mob or the ſmall, are never willing to relinquiſh it; they are prone from cupidity to abuſe it; and a multitude from infancy accuſtomed to obedience at the implicit nod of a ſatelite of tyranny could not be ſuppoſed to relinquiſh their novel authority for ſubordination.

Robeſpierre who by an extraordinary capacity for crimes, and without any of thoſe qualities of perſon or mind, which are calculated to attach men in the bonds of affection or eſteem, had obtained by his daring intrepidity and ſervility in flattering the weakneſſes of the populace, the means of getting a force with which he was enabled not only to ſacrifice his adverſaries to his ambition, but to overawe the firmeſt members in the convention, and to reduce many of them in order to effect their own ſafety to become the inſtruments of his murderous vengeance, and at length to fill the tribunals with proſcriptions and the ſcaffolds with victims.

Contrary as the ſpirit of war undoubtedly is to every good and ſound principle, and hoſtile as it muſt be to all the beſt affections of the heart, it was in the armies of France that active virtue and patriotiſm were moſt uniform and conſpicious. Talents were no doubt diſplayed in both, and the combinations of thoſe vaſt plans of conqueſt which were laid in the committees, and carried into effect in the field, are the ſtrongeſt teſtimonies of that ſuperiority of genius which could combine them under circumſtances ſo adverſe to ſtudy and reflection.

The hall of the convention appeared but as a great theatre, on which bad men contended for power, while the genius of the republic ſeemed occaſionally to appear by the organ of a reporter, on ſome immenſe plan of finance, of war, of education, of public inſtitutions, or relation of victory; while the pyramidal column of tyranny, which on the fall of the throne, had formd the wideſt baſe and gradually and inſenſibly elevated itſelf towards its apex and terminated in a viſible point.

The progreſs of the factions in France will form an important part of future hiſtory; the fall of Gironde, was the ſignal for conteſt between the Jacobins and Cordeliers, who having both compoſed the mountain, and either actually or tacitly concurred in the overthrow of their great rival, were to ſtruggle for power among themſelves. Robeſpierre and Danton were now the prominent heads of the two clubs. The former retained all the violent and the infamous—The latter poſſeſſed the moſt ſplendid men of genuis who had eſcaped the proſcription. Before we enter on theſe ungrateful topics, it will be neceſſary to notice ſome proceedings of the convention.

On the firſt of January, a decree was paſſed, "That every general condemned to death ſhould in future be executed at the head of the army which he ſhould have attempted to betray." At the ſame time the affairs of the navy were taken into conſideration, and it was repreſented that as the puniſhment of flogging, ſo unatural and ineffectual, ſo derogatory of the character of freemen had been aboliſhed from the foundation of the republic in all its armies, that the ſame principle ſhould be extended to the navy; which was accordingly decreed; and other puniſhments, ſuch as ſtoppage of pay, portions of proviſions, confinement, reduction of rank, and expoſure before their comrades, when guilty of petty offences, ſhould be ſubſtituted.

On the third of February three deputies from the iaſlnd of St. Domingo were received into the convention, as repreſentatives from that place. One of the deputies was a negro, and the other two perſons of colour. On the ſucceeding day theſe deputies gave an account of the troubles of that place, they aſcribed them to Galbaud, the friend of Dumourier; who with the gold of Spain aided by the influence of England wiſhed to corrupt the coloniſts; that finding his intrigues fail, he fled to the Engliſh in Canada, leaving behind him marks of his ferocity and rage at the Cape. The orator then delivered a panegyric on the people of colour. "Who are theſe men." ſaid he, "repreſented ſo worthleſs and ſo wicked? Who can ſay they are not good fathers, huſbands, and ſons? that they are not friends to the poor. protectors of the helpleſs, the guardians alike of infancy and age? That they are not hoſpitable? Is it to be wondered at that ſix hundred thouſand men of colour, ſhaking off their chains ſhould be terrible to thoſe who would wiſh to enſlave them, contrary to the example and wiſhes of the country that has adopted them? But ſince civil war has ceaſed who ſhall accuſe them of a neglect of their duties? What have they demanded? Liberty to work— and wages for their labour! What unnatural—what unreaſonable—what extravagant deſires!— How henious in the eyes of thoſe who, plunged in debauchery and idleneſs, lament the ceſſation of that human traffic which ſupported them in a ſtate of effeminate tyranny, that diſgraced the country from whence they ſprung and human nature itſelf! Who are they that outrage the ears of France by calumnies that exhibit us as unworthy of liberty, of even the acquiſitions of our toil, and what is the evidence of their veracity and our crimes?—They are the emigrants, thoſe beings who carry themſelves abroad the living monuments of vice, prejudice, and tyranny, who fear for the freedom of France and her colonies, becauſe the country will lay its hand upon two milliards forfeited by their treaſons againſt the republic—and mark the evidence of our crimes—we are black, or we are of different ſhades removed from black and white!—Theſe are the men and this is the evidence! Legiſlators ſuch accuſations and ſuch evidence merit no confutation—They carry it along with them—the republic is juſt. Inſtruct the men of colour and they will be found true and worthy republicans. They have ſworn to live free or die—the power or the perfidy, of Spain and Britain are in vain—we have ſworn it, and our oath is that of nature."

The deputy had no ſooner concluded, than Lacroix roſe, and moved the total abolition of ſlavery in the French colonies, and that all perſons of all colours from white to black incluſive, are French citizens. The convention roſe by a ſpontaneous emotion and paſſed the decree. A moſt affecting ſcene took place, the members individually embraced the deputies, and tears of joy trickled down their cheeks; a female negro, who had diligently attended the ſittings of the convention fainted with exceſs of delight.

Danton then obſerved—' hitherto you have decreed liberty only to yourſelves, but to-day in the the face of the Univerſe, you have decreed univerſal liberty. Hitherto your liberty has appeared with a kind of ruſt, to-day it is brightened. Yeſterday when I ſaw the preſident embrace the negro citizen now our fellow deputy, I was ready to move the propoſition which is now decreed. The aſſembly was not ſufficiently full-- This day you have done juſtice to humanity. But let us be moderators of this wiſe decree. Let us reflect that a ſudden tranſition from ſlavery to liberty may produce misfortunes, while we wiſh only to produce bleſſings. It belongs to the republic to bear the torch of truth to every part of the globe. We now labour for poſterity, and they will judge the benefits beſtowed on them. You have given liberty to man, and at the ſame time, without perceiving it, you have given a deadly blow to our moſt implacable and incurable enemy, to that enemy whoſe exiſtence is foſtered by the ignorance and indolence of all nations; by the enſlavement of two quarters of the world, and by rendering the other two quarters tributary to her for the labours of thoſe ſlaves. In ſpite of the intrigues of St. James's and of the blindneſs and treachery of nations who are ſervile to her, liberty will extend its branches. I move that the decree be referred to the committee of public ſafety that they may take prudent meaſures for carrying it into execution, without danger or impediment." It was agreed to do ſo.

On the ninth of February it was decreed, that the ſoldiers of the republic, from the general to the private citizen ſoldier, ſhould have the ſame allowance of proviſions. And the ſame regulation was extended to the navy. On the fifteenth of February the maritime flag decreed by the conſtituent aſſembly was ſuppreſſed, and it was decreed that in future it ſhould conſiſt of the three national colours in equal bands, placed in a vertical direction, ſo that the blue ſhould be affixed to the ſtaff of the flag, the white in the middle, and the red floating in the air; the jack and the enſign to be diſpoſed of in the ſame manner, obſerving the uſual proportion of ſize; the pennants or ſtreamers of the ſame colours in the ſame order, only that one fifth ſhould be blue, one fifth white, and three fifths red.

On the ſecond of February a report was brought up on the celebrated law of the maximum, or higheſt fixed rate, above which the neceſſaries of life ſhould not be ſold throughout the republic. The table of articles comprehended proviſions, clothing, grocery, firing, and military ſtores. The labours of this committee were conſiderable, and Barrere pronounced a panegyric on them and the good effects that would ariſe from the decree; he obſerved that it would at once defeat the efforts of the ill-diſpoſed and avaricious—'Let the rich,' ſaid he, 'reſign the ſuperflueties of their ſumptuous tables, where luxury and vanity alone are fed! Let them ceaſe to conſume in one day the food of many months! Let us all impoſe on ourſelves ſome civic privations, let us ſuppreſs all the delicacies calculated for voluptuaries and not for republicans!'

A member oppoſed the law, becauſe he deemed it impoſſible to execute it while the price of labour was not fixed. 'How can you require a ſhoemaker to ſell ſhoes at a fixed price, when the workman he employs aſks a higher price for his manual labour?' Barrere acknowleged the juſtice of this remark, and ſaid, that 'ſeveral good works written at the commencement of the revolution ſhould be ſtudied—the workman certainly ought to find for his labour and for the time he had expended in acquiring his art, not only a preſent compenſation but wherewithal to ſupport his family and to provide for old age. Work is the real wealth of a nation;' he moved to refer the ſubject to the committees of commerce, agriculture, and public welfare, which was ordered.

Thoſe concluſions are flattering and ſolid, but the premiſes appear not to be ſo well founded. In a time of natural ſcarcity and danger, the firſt principle is the ſecurity of the whole, and the retrenchment of what is not abſolutely neceſſary to ſubſiſtence and health becomes an eſſential duty. But a maximum of prices is in many reſpects calculated to produce miſchief, eſpecially in a country which from general or temporary circumſtances is reduced to depend on foreign importation. No doubt it operates againſt monopoliſts and extortioners, and in theſe reſpects was of much importance to France at that time, when foreign agents and foreign gold were employed to foreſtal thoſe articles, to enhance their price, and to aggravate the general diſtreſs. On the ſame day Chaudot, a notary, who had been engaged in negociating a loan of money for the Engliſh prince of Wales, was ordered for execution, it having been ſatisfactorily proved that he was not only an agent in that tranſaction, but in tranſporting the ſpecie of the country abroad. The conduct of this man and others tended to render the maximum more palateable, and leſs ſubject to clamour, but experience proved it to be an injurious meaſure, and it appears to have been one of thoſe fatal ſacrifices which the tyrant made to the populace of Paris, although he made it a ſubject of accuſation againſt thoſe he wiſhed to proſcribe at a ſubſequent period.

On the twenty-ſixth of February another pernicious decree was paſſed, which inveſted the committee of public ſafety with powers of a dangerous nature. The ſubject was introduced by St. Juſt in a ſpeech upon a report ordered to be made of the number of perſons in confinement. He ſaid 'there muſt certainly be ſome conſpiracy in agitation, for the enemies of the republic confined in priſon for their treaſons were ſought to be enlarged. A political ſect exiſts in France, which plays on all parties. It walks a ſlow pace. When you mention terror, it talks of clemency; and when you are clement, it talks of ſeverity. When you experience diſaſters, it propheſies misfortunes more extenſive; and if we are ſucceſsful, our victories are either not mentioned or diminiſhed. Revolutions march from weakneſs to audacity, and from audacity to crimes. The indulgence with which the rebels of La Vendée were treated on their firſt ſuppreſſion has already coſt an additional loſs of two hundred thouſand lives—terrible and inſtant vengeance would have ſaved thoſe lives, and annihilated thoſe who will not ceaſe to diſturb the republic until they ceaſe to exiſt—for it is upon their enmity they live, upon the republicans whom they deſtroy they erect new claims and incitements for foreign pay and foreign ſuccours. Our enemies, ſince ſo many partiſans of theirs have been arreſted, accuſe us of acts of cruelty—but compare our acts in defence of our liberty againſt their machinations, with the acts of kings themſelves—in 1787 Louis XVI. ordered one thouſand men to be ſhot in the ſuburb of St. Germain, and in every petty diſturbance the military were ordered to fire on the people. We have a revolutionary tribunal which in the ſpace of one year condemned only three hundred perſons, and this in the midſt of a revolution, and in the heart of a nation beſet with ten thouſand emiſſaries of royalty and ariſtocracy, fomenting inſurrections and crimes. How many hath England condemned for deliberate iniquity in the midſt of peace, with her boaſted government and laws, every year for a century paſt?—treble that number! But we are called cruel!—and by whom?—by the goalers of Olmutz and Madgebourg, and the tranſporters of the candid and courageous Magarot!—They talk to us of clemency when they are throwing aſſaſſins on our ſhores, laying ſnares for our deſtruction, and inviting and threatening every power of Europe to maſſacre us, to annihilate us, to blot us from the map of Europe!' He then propoſed the following decree:—

I. The committee of general ſafety is inveſted with power to ſet patriots at liberty. Every perſon who claims his liberty under this decree, ſhall be obliged to give an account of his conduct ſince the firſt of May, 1789.

II. The property of patriots is inviolable and ſacred; the effects of ſuch perſons as may be deemed enemies of the revolution, ſhall be confiſcated to the benefit of the republic. They ſhall be detained until peace is reſtored, and then baniſhed for ever.

On the twenty-fifth of February a decree was paſſed founded on a report from the committees of domains and alienation, as follows:—

I. The liſts of names, which according to the law of the twenty-ſixth of Frimaire, (the 16th of December, 1793,) was to be made of all perſons whoſe property has been, or ſhall be confiſcated to the profit of the republic, ſhall be ſent and proclaimed in the ſame manner as the general liſt of emigrants, and ſhall, beſides, be poſted up in the chief towns of each diſtrict only. In conſequence, there ſhall be only ten thouſand impreſſions of each liſt.

II. In the decade following the publication of the preſent law, there ſhall be made out particular liſts of the Engliſh, the Spaniſh, and all the ſubjects of the other foreign powers at war with France, who have any property in France, whether conſiſting of moveables or immoveables, or of credit. Theſe liſts ſhall be made out by the reſpective municipalities, within whoſe precincts they poſſeſs any property or credit.

III. Theſe liſts ſhall, within the following decade, be ſent by the national agents of the communes to the adminiſtration of diſtrict, who ſhall verify them, and ſhall add, if there be occaſion, a general ſtate, which the agent ſhall addreſs, within the third decade, to the adminiſtration of departments, and to the adminiſtration of domains.

IV. Moreover the national agents of the diſtricts ſhall be bound to ſend every month to the adminiſtration of their departments, and to the adminiſtrator of the national domains, and the national adminiſtration of regiſters, all new information they may have procured concerning the profit and the credit of each of the individuals compriſed in the ſecond article.

V. The adminiſtrator of the national domains ſhall compriſe theſe liſts and theſe informations in the tables mentioned in the firſt article of the preſent law, and in the ſtatements whoſe formation is ordered by the tenth article of the law of the twenty-ſixth of Fremaire (December 17th, 1793.)

VI. The creditors of the emigrants ſhall from henceforward have only one declaration and one depoſit of titles to make. They ſhall make them at the ſecretaries office of the diſtrict where their debtors laſt reſided, indicated by the general liſt, made in conformity to the ſecond article of the law of the twenty-ſeventh of Brumaire (November the ſixteenth, 1793.)

VII. The creditors of baniſhed perſons, of impriſoned prieſts, of Engliſhmen, of Spaniards, and the ſubjects of other powers at war with the republic, or of perſons outlawed and whoſe property is confiſcated, are ſubject to the ſame declarations and depoſit of titles as the creditors of emigrants.

VIII. Theſe declarations and depoſits ſhall be made by the creditors of emigrants and others, deſcribed in the preceding article, within four months, reckoning from the day of the publication, made in the chief town of the diſtrict. Where this term is paſt, their debts will be forfeited.

IX. The depoſitaries, public and private, the debtors, the farmers, or the holders of property belonging to emigrants and others, compriſed in the liſts or general tables mentioned in the preſent law, ſhall, within the ſame period, make the declarations preſcribed by the laws of the twenty-fifth of November, 1792, the twenty-fifth of July, and the twenty-ſixth of Frimaire, (December 16th, 1793); and this under the penalties there pronounced.

X. The diſpoſitions of the laws of the ſecond of September, the twenty-fifth of November, 1792, the thirteenth of January, 1793, the twenty-ſixth Frimaire, (December the ſixteenth, 1793,) and others, which may be contrary to thoſe of the preſent law, are annulled.

A declaration of the Engliſh government on the motives for continuing the war, had been recently publiſhed, to which the convention publiſhed a reply on the twenty-eighth of February, or rather a ſevere commentary on the declaration; the anſwer begins by reciting what is ſtated in the declaration as the object of the war—namely, "the preſervation of that ſtate of civil ſociety, happily eſtabliſhed in the ſeveral nations of Europe". The greater part of the governments of Europe being in their nature deſpotic, this part of the declaration is treated as the direct avowal of a purpoſe to uſe the reſources of Great-Britain, for the end of perpetuating "the bleſſings of deſpotiſm." —If this be the object, the anſwer proceeds to ſay—it is eaſy to conceive what part is to be acted in a country, where deſpotiſm has been overthrown. It follows as a neceſſary conſequence that famine, fire, and ſword, are to be employed to replunge that country into its ancient ſtate of ſlavery.

The Engliſh miniſter always faithful to his principles, rejoices in his manifeſto on the approaching proſpect of ſucceſs in this laudable enterpriſe. He ſees every event through the teleſcope of his wiſhes. He is ſo ardent as to take the viſion for a reality, that like Macbeth graſping at the ideal dagger, he reaſons on the fiction, as if it were an exiſting object.

It is ſtated in the declaration, that a deſire for the reſtoration of monarchy, prevailed "almoſt univerſally" in France. But where, the anſwer proceeds to enquire, was the manifeſtation of their deſire to be found? Was it in La Vendee? If it was, the ſmall cruſade of banditti in that quarter, though ſuſtained by Engliſh gold, and furniſhed with Engliſh arms, had been put to the route, and their leaders puniſhed as traitors to their country. Was it in Lyons or Toulon? The comparatively ſmall party which had been excited in thoſe towns by the perfidious ſtratagems of the Engliſh miniſter, had been defeated and puniſhed in the ſame manner. The latter town was ſaid to have been induced to revolt "by their confidence in the Engliſh government!"—After corrupting the commandants of the place to deliver up the town, the effects of corruption are quoted, with conſummate effrontery, as ſo many proofs of the confidence of the citizens!

After having eſtabliſhed the motives which induce him to continue the war, the Engliſh miniſter, ſays the anſwerer, proceeds to ſtate the conditions "on which he will conſent to make a peace." He ſtates his ardent deſire to ſee himſelf in a condition to treat for the re-eſtabliſhment of general tranquillity. But how are theſe proteſtations realized, or his "juſt and moderate propoſitions" ſtated? If he wiſhed for peace as much as he pretends to do, theſe propoſitions would at leaſt be clearly laid down. He would not avail himſelf of any circumlocution---of any ſubterfuge. But what does the Britiſh miniſter ſay on this ſubject?—He ſtates, in the firſt inſtance, that he does not conteſt, in any ſhape, the right of France to reform her laws; that he does not wiſh to influence by any external force the form of the government, to be eſtabliſhed in an independent nation. He adds, that ſuch an object was never within the limits of his deſire!

If there had been one word of truth in theſe aſſertions, the obſtacles to a peace might have been eaſily removed. He had nothing to do, but to recal his fleets and armies; to concede to the French their indubitable right to form a government for themſelves, and a negotiation for the re-eſtabliſhment of peace, would naturally have followed.

But what ſhall be ſaid if all that he has advanced on this ſubject is found to be nothing more than falſehood and impoſture; and that his profeſſions are contradicted by himſelf almoſt in the inſtant that they are uttered!

In the very next paſſage of the declaration the Britiſh miniſter promiſes "a ſuſpenſion of hoſtilities; and friendſhip, ſafety, and protection, as far as the courſe of events will permit, to all Frenchmen who, by declaring for a monarchial government, ſhall ſhake off the yoke of anarchy."—He invites the French people to co-operate for that purpoſe —to ſerve under the colours of a hereditary monarchy, and to unite, under the empire of law, morality, and religion. This is the man who rejects the influence of all exterior force. This is the man who deſires not to interfere in the internal form of the French government. The miniſter of England deſires peace ſo ardently that he dictates the very terms on which he knows it will not be accepted!

Whilſt he complains againſt anarchy, he himſelf excites ſedition. He invites the minority of the French nation to revolt againſt the majority; to oppoſe themſelves to the general will; and to take up arms for the purpoſe of eſtabliſhing an abſolute monarchy. He ſtates, at the ſame time, the number of "well-diſpoſed" perſons in France, and to theſe he addreſſes particularly his declaration. This deſcription of perſons, which he omits to ſtate, conſiſts of honeſt bankrupts, of prieſts, without faith or law, of ſtarving nobles, and inſolent proſtitutes, of pickpockets out of employ, and of knights of induſtry of the order of St. Louis;—of men who live like worms but from corruption, and exiſt like muſhrooms only on the dunghill.

The character of the late queen of France is then exhibited in a very diſguſting view, for the purpoſe of contraſting her debaucheries and political intrigues with thoſe of the Princeſs Sophia of Hanover, the mother of the dynaſty that occupies the Engliſh throne. It then returns to a review of the internal ſituation of France.

This country is now in a revolutionary ſtate. It turns on its political axis, and tends by its gravitation to the centre of liberty. The laws are the neceſſary reſult of the exigencies of the moment; they are either mild or vigorous, corrective or encouraging, as the public welfare and the importance of the object may require. England has had its revolution; and it is not juſt to compare a nation which has effected its revolution, to another now in the criſis of an effort in ſome meaſure ſimilar, but immenſely more mighty, effectual, and diſaſtrous. The former is in a ſtate of repoſe, the latter in progreſſive motion. The anſwer after diſplaying this difference very perſpicuouſly, proceeds to draw a ſtrong picture of the actual ſtate of England. The common-law, ſo much extolled by thoſe who do not feel its rigour, inequality, chicanery, and oppreſſion, or by thoſe who are placed by opulence or power above its reach, is as corrupt and as much the ſubject of barter as law in any of the deſpotic nations of Europe; juſtice adminiſtered in its courts, is as much a lottery as the ſcheme of gambling which produces an annual ſupply to the government. The crimnal code of England is equally barbarous, and can find no parallel but in the bloody laws of Draco; at certain periods, which occur every ſix weeks in the metropolis and every three months in the provinces, human victims are plunged into eternity in ſuch numbers, that if their crimes were but in proportion to their executions, the iſland of Britain alone would ſurpaſs the collective wickedneſs of the whole earth; but the barbarity is in the law, which inflicts death alike on the wretch whom poverty condemns to ſteal for ſubſiſtence and the wanton murderer; the laws themſelves are ſo multitudinous, ſo confuſed, ſo contradictory, that thouſands obtain ſubſiſtence only by giving opinions upon them, and the laws afford ſo many means for ſubterfuge and doubt, that opinions may be had on any queſtion on either ſide ſide without ſtill admitting of any certainty whether the judge who is to decide may not hold an open or interpretation of the law different from both; beſide theſe laws there are opinions of judges and lawyers in ages remote which have all the authority of laws—and although it is a conſtant maxim that diſcretion in the judges is tyranny, yet under the ſhield of precedent, the Engliſh judges are not only poſſeſſed of complete diſcretion, but a diſcretion to decide by their own judgment in civil affairs where no precedent is found applicable; yet theſe laws, are ſo ſacred that to find fault with them is to incur the puniſhment of fine, impriſonment, or pillory.

In the declaration of the Engliſh miniſter, tranſmitted to the commanders of the Engliſh fleets and armies, and which was expected to work miracles, ſound took place of ſenſe—and words of argument; in one place all was menace and haughtineſs, in another all was ſoftneſs and reconciliation; in one place the aſs brayed, and in the other the lion roared. In the exordium "a juſt indemnity" is demanded for himſelf and allies; in the middle of the piece he prefers no ſuch demand, In the concluſion he makes a number of requiſitions which he knows will never be granted! He aſks among other things that a legitimate government may be eſtabliſhed in France. But who was to be judge of this legitimacy, the Engliſh miniſter or the French people? The work was already accompliſhed, he ſaw, he heard, and felt it—the French republic knows no arbiter but the general will of its people, and it has already decided and Europe has ſeen that the deciſion is legitimate.

The time is not far diſtant when neceſſity will compel the preſumptuous and ignorant miniſter of England, to ſolicit peace from that government which he really trembles at, but effects to contemn. If France were to copy the example he now ſets, what ſhould then be her language to England? Go form a ſtable and legitimate government in England? and France might add--Go and reſtore to the Engliſh people the rights of which they are robbed---reform that corrupt ſyſtem which you now ſupport, and by which you are ſapping the foundations of proſperity and happineſs in every nation with which you are even the moſt remotely connected—The cabinet, the miniſters, the parliament, France would conſider, as you now effect to conſider France—as a combination of uſurped powers. The people of France will treat only with the people of Great-Britain!

The conflicts of party occaſioned by the ambition of Robeſpierre became at this period ſo important in their conſequences, that even the brilliant victories of the armies carry but a ſecondary intereſt; it will be neceſſary then to take up the chain of events from the year preceding, and to carry forward the civil tranſactions to the middle of the year; after which the military annals may be taken up from the commencement of the campaign without interruption.

Already have the two rival clubs been deſignated, which at this period divided the political hopes and fears of the nation. Jealouſy which had proved ſo fatal to the leaders of the various factions, had gradually detached many members from the Jacobins and Cordeliers, and attached them to their former rivals. The Cordeliers club became diſtinguiſhed for its energy and its talents, but theſe were circumſtances ſufficiently alarming to the leaders of the Jacobins, and Danton ſeeing the danger to which diſtinction was expoſed, had judged it neceſſary to his ſecurity to abandon that club to other leaders. Hebert, Vincent, and Ronſin, whoſe ſervices to Robeſpierre in the commune, and in the pro-ſcriptions which he had contrived, were repaid with the contempt and flight of the great leader; the Jacobin club became irkſome to them, and they took refuge in the Cordeliers, where the abſence of Danton left a vacancy which was not likely to be filled with equal energy or effect. Theſe perſons, however, ſoon retreived that notice which had been clouded in the Jacobins, and there is little reaſon to doubt that they became as eager to promote the fall of Robeſpierre as they had been before active in the perpetration of his deſires. There belonged to this club ſtill men of the firſt literary talents and eſtabliſhed patriotiſm, ſuch as Camille Deſmoulins, and Fabre d'Eglantine. Hebert, however became the leading man, for the literary members mentioned, were more ſolicitous of producing good than obtaining popularity, which appears to have been now the object and the misfortune of Hebert, and he did not ſpare the members of his club any more than others, whom he deemed deſerving of animadverſion in his journal, called Pere Ducheſne; he had been at the head of the municipality, and arreſted by the commiſſion of twelve prior to the thirty-firſt of May, 1793, and that tranſaction was the ſignal of revolt for the mountain party; now the mountain was divided, Robeſpierre ſaw his inſtrument become his rival for popularity, and ſoaring on the baleful wings of vulgarity and indecency, to a height that might render Hebert dangerous to his own power. The facility with which plots had been effected rendered this probable, and fearing perhaps that the perfidy of the man whom he had made the inſtrument of his crimes, might be the inſtrument of his own condemnation and paſſage to the ſcaffold, it became neceſſary to his ſecurity to make a new ſacrifice.

Not only the anti-religious principles of the Cordeliers were at this period carried to the moſt extravagent lengths, but philoſophy itſelf became ridiculous in the hands of maniacs and aſſaſſins who affected to profeſs it. But to conciliate the poor and ignorant, the wildeſt theories were preached, and even Agrarian law was held forth as the ſummit of perfect government, and indiſpenſible to true equality. With theſe tenets the fanatics had aſſumed a conſiſtent garb. The term Sanſculotte, which from its origin had become a term of pride, and had been adopted with much effect by the victorious legions of the republic, was now the only appellation which was tolerated by them, a ſqualid ſhabby external, long trowſers or pantaloons, ſhort jackets, black wigs, red caps, or the hair cut ſhort behind and worn without powder, and linen always ſoiled, were the faſhionable habilaments of theſe enrages.

This ſpecies of attire was a very ſingular contraſt to Robeſpierre's, who always appeared dreſſed with ſtudied neatneſs and powdered hair; this circumſtance did not paſs unobſerved in the Journal of Hebert, who, alſo jealous of the genius of Camille and Fabre, attacked them as diſguiſed Briſſotines.

In the beginning of March, the table of the rights of man, in the hall of the Cordeliers, was covered with black crape; and Hebert from the tribune of the ſociety aſſerted —"That tyranny exiſted in the republic."

At this period ſome actual conſpiracies had been diſcovered, and ſeveral reports were made to the convention from the committees. On the ſixth of March Barrere ſignified the diſcovery of ſeveral foreign intrigues, and ſaid—"We have deduced from hiſtory all the leſſons and all the experience with which ſhe could furniſh us. We have our eyes fixed on all our agents, and on all the public functionaries; even the national repreſentation in the departments is not exempt from our vigilance. We have agents in every part of Europe—we have agents even in America, from whom we learn the plots of the emigrants from the colonies, and of the envoys from the European courts. We are not ignorant that theſe courts uſe every artifice to penetrate into our projects. We therefore attack them with the ſame meaſures which they employ againſt us. The combined powers cannot ſpeak a word which we do not hear. The conferences of Mack at London, of Luchefini at Frankfort—the new tactics of the ſlave in uniform—are all known to us.

" If Paris, which is the firm centre of patriotiſm and courage, be each day fretted and teazed by petty conſpiracies---if every hour gives birth to ſome counter-revolutionary intrigue, and to a variety of falſe reports---if corruption and ſtock-jobbing go hand in hand in the metropolis, what muſt be the ſtate of intrigue on the frontiers? In the ſpace of one month four plots have been detected---At Havre, the national wealth has been in conſtant exportation, and the paper medium depreciated by the ſame agency; we have ſeized the perſons with all their correſpondence, and they are before the tribunal. At Liſle a lawyer, named Legoſne, was occupied as the agent of the emigrants and foreign powers, in ſending ſpecie abroad and circulating aſſignats forged in England. He is ſeized and his papers. At Maubege a national agent had ſold himſelf to our enemies, kept up a correſpondence, enliſted recruits, and ſent packets of intelligence to the prince of Cobourg. He is ſeized and confeſſed his correſpondence with ſeveral Engliſh agents, particularly one Fielding at Calais; they are ſeized. Finally, at Landrecy a new treaſon has been diſcovered and baffled. We ſhall ſoon publiſh the inſidious advice given by the Engliſh general Moira on the project entruſted to him."

On the thirteenth of March St. Juſt made a report of a conſpiracy which, he ſaid, was to produce the corruption and loſs of Paris—" ſince the decree depriving ſuſpected perſons of their property the ſtroke is felt, and efforts are made to famiſh us in the interior while our enemies abroad attempt to block up our coaſts. A law was lately paſſed againſt foreigners, next day an exception was made in favour of artiſts, and the day following all the foreigners were artiſts, even the phyſicians."

A decree was paſſed on the report, for an arreſt of ſuſpected perſons, and on the fifteenth of March, St. Juſt communicated to the convention the following letter of the public accuſer of the revolutionary tribunal.

" In conſequence of the information received at the revolutionary tribunal, in execution of the decrees of the national convention, which order the public accuſer to arreſt the authors and accomplices of the conſpiracy formed againſt the liberty and ſecurity of the people, I haſten to announce to you, that the reſult of my enquiries permitted me not to defer any longer the arreſt of Ronſin, Vincent, Hebert, Momoro, Ducroquet, and general Lamur. A Dutch banker, of the name of Koch, is alſo ordered to be arreſted, at the moment I am writing. The enquiries and informations are going on; I hope ſoon to obtain intelligence. I promiſe you that that the tribunal will neglect nothing to find out all the culpable. (Signed) Amar."

It was in vain that Hebert in his journal affirmed, that he was not preſent when the club of Cordeliers covered the table of the rights of man with a mourning veil; it was in vain he affirmed that he meant not to glance at Robeſpierre in his denunciations againſt Camille, Philipaaux, and others. Some letters either real or fictitious were produced, ſaid to have been detected in which the ſtate of parties was deſcribed, that the committees and Jacobins were in concert to carry on the revolution effectually, but that Hebert and the Cordeliers had the popular voice, and were endeavouring to deſtroy Robeſpierre.

On the twenty-firſt of March he was brought before the revolutionary tribunal, together with Momoro, Ronſin, Vincent, Ducroquet, a hair-dreſſer and commiſſioner againſt monopoliſts; Koch, a Dutch banker; Lamur a colonel of the ſixth regiment; Proly a natural ſon of prince Kaunitz reſiding as a wine merchant in Paris, and publiſhing a journal; Desfieux, a wine merchant; Pereira a Portugueſe jew; Anacharſis Cloots, a Pruſſian and deputy of the convention; Le Clerc chief of the ſecond diviſion of the war department; Dubuiſſion, a man of letters; Marie Anne the wife of Quieteneau; and ſix others.

The following are the moſt material charges againſt them, which were ſet forth much at large in the act of accuſation:—

"That the conſpiracy tended to reſtore deſpotiſm, and to murder the repreſentatives of the people; that the tyrant who was to govern the French nation was firſt to have the title of Great Judge!

"That the Engliſh government and the allied powers were the real chiefs of that conſpiracy, and made uſe of men inveſted with the public confidence, namely, Hebert, Ronſin, Momoro, and Vincent, whoſe only ambition was to obtain places and wealth by the revolution, that they might indulge their vices and exceſſes.

"That the principal conſpirators, Ronſin, Hebert, Vincent, and Lamur, uſed to meet at night at Paſſy, at the houſe of the Dutch banker Koch, where they concerted their plans, and revelled in debauchery till late in the morning.

"That each of the conſpirators had a part preſcribed for him; that Ronſin with Mauzel went to the different houſes of arreſt, to take down the names of all thoſe priſoners whom they thought the fitteſt to execute their plots.

"That Hebert and Vincent would at one time denounce the bad citizens, at another the courageous defenders of the people, to miſlead the public opinion, and to involve in one common ruin the national repreſentation and all the patriots, as the authors of the want of proviſions, while it was manifeſt that they alone, in concert with Ronſin and Mazuel, kept a part of the revolutionary army in the moſt ſhameful inactivity.

"That thoſe ſame conſpirators, with their accomplices Momoro, Ducroquet, Labourdeau, Ancard, and Bourgeois, propoſed to cover the rights of man with a funeral crape.

"That the above parties went to all the public places to calumniate and vilify the national repreſentation.

"That they caluminated in a like manner the members of the committees of public and general ſafety, and demanded the renewal of the national repreſentation.

"That the ſyſtem of reducing Paris by famine was purſued by all the conſpirators at one and the ſame time; that the public functionaries, in different communes, gave orders in conſequence of this plot, that no proviſions ſhould be brought to Paris, in order to bring on the criſis which was to reſtore deſpotiſm and tyranny.

"That it was the deſign of Ronſin to employ the revolutionary army in the execution of this dreadful plot; that Ronſin wiſhed that the revolutionary army conſiſted of one hundred thouſand, inſtead of ſix thouſand men; which manifeſted his deſire of being a Cromwell, were it only for twenty-four hours.

"That this fictitious famine made every day a greater progreſs.

"That the conſpirators inflamed the people, by making them believe that this famine was occaſioned by their repreſentatives, whom they intended to maſſacre.

"That Vincent declared that he would dreſs out mannikins like repreſentatives of the people, and place them in the Thuilleries, to call the people around him, and to tell them, 'Behold the fine repreſentatives you have; they preach plainneſs and this is the way they dreſs!' That this ſyſtem of vilifying the national repreſentation, formed by Vincent and his accomplices, correſponds actually with the horrid plans of the leagued deſpots.

"That other conſpirators, namely, Desfieux, Pereira, Proly, and Deſcombes, even publiſhed the names of thoſe repreſentatives whom they wiſhed to murder; and that they circulated by their agents incendiary bills throughout Paris and the adjacent communes, exhorting the people to rebel againſt the national repreſentation and the conſtituted authorities.

"That pamphlets and bills were diſtributed in all the public markets and places, ſtirring up the people to open the priſons, that the conſpirators and their accomplices might the more eaſily exterminate the repreſentatives.

"That falſe patroles were to maſſacre the citizens on duty in the houſes of arreſt; that the conſpirators meant to ſeize the mint and the national treaſury; but that the convention, at the moment when the conſpiracy was to break out, publiſhed a decree againſt the parties concerned." &c.

The principal evidence was Louis Legendre deputy in the convention for Paris, and Louis-Pierre Dufournie, architect; but their teſtimony went no farther than to prove ſome raſh and intemperate expreſſion which had been uſed by the priſoners, and the charges were generally unſupported by evidence. Labourdeau was the only perſon acquitted. There were among them, however, men to whom no part of the evidence applied, and whoſe only crime was attachment to Hebert, and the principals of this groupe of victims; among theſe was Anacharſis Cloots, a man who had been a Pruſſian baron and relinquiſhed his titles and a ſmall patrimony from an enthuſiaſtic devotion to liberty and the moſt refined philanthrophy; his paſſions had been ſo much ſuperior to his reaſon as to derange the order of his underſtanding, and to lead him into puerelities that injured the diſintereſted principles he profeſſed, and threw a ſtrong ſhade of ridicule over his character. The principal cauſe of his proſcription, was not any alliance with the perſons to whoſe fate his was linked, but the circumſtance of his atheiſtical principles, which he not only acknowledged, but preached. He had publiſhed ſeveral works, which he fantaſtically dated from Paris the capital of the globe, and had formed an enthuſiaſtic notion that as ſoon as the potentates of the earth ſhould be overthrown, all nations ſhould ſend their deputies to Paris, and the world become one great republic. But theſe chimeras were not ſo much a ſubject of cenſure as of mirth, while his atheiſm excited the hatreds of thouſands. It has been a received notion, becauſe great induſtry has been employed by the enemies of the French revolution to propogate it, that the French people were all atheiſts, Robeſpierre who knew better, ſaw that the ſacrifice of Cloots would aſſure him of a greater ſhare of popularity, becauſe the bulk of the people were really devoted to religion, and inveterate againſt atheiſm; the "orator of the human race," as Cloots called himſelf, was therefore ſacrificed to the policy of Robeſpierre and for no real crime. In the death of Hebert and his colleagues no one commiſerated, it appeared to be a juſt retribution for their crimes, and for that apathy in wickedneſs which could conceive the laſt charge againſt the late queen. Their conduct was far different from that of thoſe patriots in whoſe fall they had been ſo inſtrumental; along thoſe ſubterranean galleries were the light of day never refreſhed the ſight; terrific phantoms covered with blood ſeemed to purſue their ſteps, the headleſs trunks of murdered victims ſeemed to encumber the ground over which they trembingly crept, while the groans, and ſighs of the unfortnnate in thoſe gloomy cells ſeemed to proceed from the ſpirits of thoſe matyred patriots, calling forth from the hollow vaults this band of aſſaſſins to a juſt death.

Cloots, however, partook neither of their crimes nor their terrors—while Hebert, Momoro and Vincent paſſed their time like the fallen angels of Milton in mutual accuſations, he rallied the ſpirits of thoſe who were ſinking under the infirmity of their minds, and preached atheiſm to them until they ſucceſſively paſſed that bourne which was to teſt his awful doctrines.

As the characters of theſe men excited no reſpect, ſo their death commanded no compaſſion, they were executed amidſt the applauſes of the ſurroun[illegible] multitude, and the air reſounded with acclamations at the death of thoſe conſpirators and with ſhouts of vive la Republique!

The death of Hebert was the ſignal for throwing off the hideous maſquerade of Sansculotiſm, in which all the world had been arrayed during the winter, in ſubmiſſive deference to the interpretation of a falſe equality. Black wigs, red caps, and ſhort jackets were now thrown aſide, and the eye once more was gratified with the appearance of decent apparel, clean linen, and powdered locks; the women too who for ſome months had reluctantly bound up their hair beneath round eared caps, now unfolded their treſſes to the vernal air, and decorated their perſons at will, provided always that the national cockade formed a part of the ornaments.

The ſucceſs and popularity of Robeſpierre on this proſcription was ſuch as to enſure him a complete power over the lives of all who ſtood in the way of his ambition; and he loſt no time in hatching another conſpiracy, and dubbing a new brood of traitors. The Gironde had fallen before him, the Cordeliers had been rent and deſtroyed, his coadjutors on the mountain were now to partake of his unquenchable ire. Amar, who now became the agent of Robeſpierre, as Hebert had been before, had on the ſixteenth of March made a report on an alleged conſpiracy of Chabot, Delaunay of Angers, Julien of Thouloufe, Bazire, and Fabre d'Eglantine. Theſe he deſcribed as engaged in a conſpiracy with the rebels of La Vendée and the court of London. That they were only the ſucceſſors in iniquity of Lafayette, Dumourier, Cuſtine, Briſſot, and the correſpondents of Cobourg and Pitt. That they had engaged in a vaſt plan of ſtockjobbing, in conjunction with count Proly, two German barons of the name of Frey, baron Batz, a member of the conſtituent aſſem ly, Renulph a Genoeſe, Goeth an Engliſh banker, and Guſmah a Spaniſh intriguer, all in Paris. That the accuſed deputies made uſe of their ſituations under the republic for the purpoſe of amaſſing fortunes, and in ſome inſtances had accepted bribes; that they maintained a venal correſpondence to forward their avaricious views. The bankers Frey were deſcribed as unworthy republicans, having accepted of noble titles from Maria Thereſa, had a brother ſerving in the imperial army, and had given two hundred thouſand livres portion with their ſiſter who was married to Chabot. Delaunay was ſaid to be the friend of Batz, a profound calculator and ſtockjobber, and that with Julien they had contrived to enrich themſelves by the operations againſt the Eaſt-India company, that had been in the laſt year impoſed on the convention. That Fabre d'Eglantine propoſed to make the company pay ſix millions to the republic, when he knew they owed eight; that India ſtock was lowered by their manoeuvres, and that Chabot and Delaunay by their influence in the commiſſion which was appointed to report on the affairs of the company, had completed this plot of fraud, by altering the decree in conjunction with Fabre, and ſending it ſo altered to the committee of minutes. That Benoit, the agent of the directors, paid Fabre one hundred thouſand livres, and a like ſum to Chabot. And the ſum of five hundred thouſand was depoſited to be divided between Chabot, Fabre, Julien, and Delaunay; and that Benoit offered Chabot one hundred and fifty thouſand for his ſhare.

The charge of ſtock-jobbing appears to have been unequivocally proved, for the parties accuſed each other, with a view ſeverally to their own ſafety. It alſo was ſtated in the evidence, that 510,000 franks had been depoſited to ſave the lives of Fonfrede and Ducos who fell with the Girondiſts, and ſome of the members now accuſed were to have received that ſum could they have effected that object. It was alſo among the charges laid againſt them, that they had attempted to ſend a letter with fifty louis-d'ors to young Capet in the Temple, with a view to his eſcape and to place him on the throne.

The debate on this report was highly characteriſtic of the terror that prevailed. Billaud Varennes expreſſed much anger at the reporter, for having neglected to fix the attention of the convention on the real ſource and object of corruption. He ſaid it was intended to involve in infamy not the names of a few deputies, but the whole of the repreſentatives and the nation. Robeſpierre expreſſed his anger alſo at the neglect—"There is one ſtriking obſervation which I ſhall ſubmit to you; I call upon the tyrants of the earth to compare themſelves with the repreſentatives of the people; I dare to this compariſon one man, whoſe name has too often ſullied this place, and which therefore I will not repeat—I throw down the gauntlet to that body which aſſociating itſelf with that man, fixes its attention on France, to ſee what will be the reſult of that frightful ſyſtem of treachery with which he endeavors to undermine us—What is the difference between us? They boaſt of ſelling themſelves to the beſt bidder, while we, as ſoon as we diſcover a traitor or a corrupt deputy, ſend him to the ſcaffold."

The confounded reporter with the utmoſt humility acknowleged the judiciouſneſs and ſtrength of the obſervations that had been juſt made, that the omiſſion was not from any deſire to ſuppreſs truths ſo important, but from an opinion that he was bound to confine himſelf to ſimple narration; but, ever ready to give up all ſelf-love, he was free to declare, that the able ſpeeches juſt delivered had convinced him of the propriety of inſerting ſuch obſervations in the report, and he wiſhed his report to be referred to a committee for the purpoſe, which was ordered accordingly.

On the ſame day one of the ſections of Paris ſent a deputation to the convention, demanding that they ſhould decide on the fate of Elizabeth Capet;—"It is time," ſaid they, "that the impure remains of the family which butchered the people on the tenth of Auguſt ſhould fall under the avenging and protecting law."

On the ſeventeenth of March report was made that Herault Sechelles and Simond had been arreſted as partiſans in the recent conſpiracy.

On the eighteenth Danton congratulated the convention on its vigor, and after paying a compliment to the Pariſians on their patriotiſm, he propoſed that every thing concerning the conſpiracy ſhould be referred to the committees of public ſafety and general ſecurity. This propoſition which was intended by the mover as an aſſurance of confidence in the independence and juſtice of the committees which he did not feel, and with a view to cover a grand and benevolent conſpiracy upon which he had bent all the energies of his ſoul, was adopted, and only accelerated his own fall and protracted for a longer period the tyranny of Robeſpierre and the afflictions of France.

On the twentieth Couthon had notified, that the conſpirators would be tried the next day. He ſignified at the ſame time, that another ſeparate conſpiracy exiſted which would ſpeedily be developed. Whether the jealous penetration of Robeſpierre had diſcerned in the motion of Danton on the eighteenth a cauſe of alarm, or that the treachery or indiſcretion of ſome of thoſe who had entered into Danton's views, betrayed the plan that was agreed upon for doing away the ſanguinary ſyſtem that had ſo deeply wounded France, has not been diſcovered; ſeveral members of both committees had entered warmly into the deſign, and Danton had pledged himſelf to go into retirement as ſoon the plan ſhould be accompliſhed. But the vengeance of Robeſpierre never ſlept; Danton in the meantime had diſcovered that his ruin was ready to be decided, and in vain endeavoured to compromiſe the jealouſy by propoſitions manly and benignant.

On the thirty-firſt of March, Legendre on entering the hall ſaid—"Four of our colleagues were arreſted laſt night by order of your committees—the celebrated Danton is one of them: I know not the names of the other three. If they are guilty, I will be the firſt to call for their puniſhment; but you ought to hear them. I am pure, and I believe Danton to be as pure as myſelf."

A member called out to keep to order, and a noiſe was made with a view to interrupt Legendre. Robeſpierre it was obſerved attempted to ſpeak, but his utterance was ſtopped by his ſurpriſe at the boldneſs of Legendre.

The preſident ſaid he would not ſuffer ſuch diſorderly proceedings, nor the freedom of ſpeech to be infringed; that this day would be glorious to liberty, and that the people and poſterity would judge their conduct.

Legendre reſumed—"He feared that private animoſities were about to ſacrifice men who had rendered ſervices to the republic that would immortalize them." He ſpoke of his own connections with Danton, which were founded only on the purity of his moral and republican principles; of what Danton had done in 1792, when miniſter of juſtice, "to the advantage of the republic, and to the ſalvation of ſo many innocent lives." He concluded with moving that the deputies arreſted laſt night ſhould be heard at the bar. This motion was received with much, but not general applauſe. Fayau oppoſed the motion.

Robeſpierre aſcended the tribune, with a diſordered countenance.—"From theſe diſturbances, for a long time unknown in this aſſembly, it is evident that a grand intereſt is in queſtion,—Whether certain men ſhall be more powerful than their country? Why elſe is this motion, which was rejected when made by Danton in favour of Chabot and Bazire, now applauded by ſome individuals? I repeat it, the queſtion is, Whether or not certain ambitious men ſhall be ſtronger than liberty? What then!---ſhall we have made ſo many ſacrifices only to fall under the yoke of intriguers? Little do I regard the eulogies which people beſtow on themſelves and their friends. No more do we aſk what a man has done at this or that period: we aſk what has been his conduct during the whole of his political career. Legendre pretends not to know the names of the deputies arreſted. Knows he not that Lacroix, his friend, is of the number? he effects ignorance, becauſe he knows that he cannot pronounce the name of Lacroix, but with ſhame. He chooſes rather to ſpeak of Danton, the intimate friend of Lacroix, becauſe the name of Danton is leſs offenſive. We ſhall now ſee whether or not the convention can break in pieces an idol. Could not all that is ſaid of Danton be ſaid of Briſſot, Hebert, and Chabot? They were, at certain periods, the defenders of liberty. Why then ſhould Danton be allowed a privilege which was denied to his companion Fabre d'Eglantine?—Attempts are made to alarm you on the abuſe of power. What have you done which you have not done freely, which has not contributed to the ſalvation of your country, which has not drawn upon you the bleſſings of the people? It is feared that individuals may be ſacrificed. Do you then diſtruſt that juſtice which conſtitutes the people's hope? I declare, that whoever trembles at this criſis is guilty. Me too they have tried to intimidate. The friends of Danton have written, that if Danton be overthrown, I muſt periſh under the ſtrokes of the ariſtocrats. They have imagined that connections might induce me to divert the courſe of juſtice. What ſignified to me the dangers that might threaten? My life is my country's, my heart is free from reproach, and above all fear. I was alſo the friend of Petion, of Roland, and of Briſſot: they betrayed their country, and I declared againſt them. Danton wiſhes to take their place: Danton, in my eyes, is only the enemy of his country. The guilty are not ſo numerous as they would have us believe. The moſt criminal are thoſe who would raiſe up idols and domineerers. To propoſe a courſe with ſome members, not allowed in behalf of others, is an inſult to liberty. The cauſe of the guilty could be pleaded only by their accomplices. I move the previous queſtion on Legendre's motion."

St. Juſt then appeared at the tribune, and ſpoke as follows:---"The revolution is in the people, not in the renown of certain individuals. The revolution conſiſts in the love of the country; and it was by the irreſiſtable impulſion that Manlius was hurled from the capitol, and Regulus delivered into the hands of the executioner. It is by this ſentiment, and by its ſubline counſels, that, in the midſt of ſtorms and perils, your committees have ſtriven againſt the faction they had juſt ſubdued, and have made war againſt all thoſe who, purſuing different means, but agreeing as to their plans, have conſtantly endeavoured to degrade the national repreſentation. After ſo much ſeverity, it certainly requires ſome courage to practice a new ſeverity; but the courage of Juſtice is the fruit and reſult of the energy of virtue. To defeat the new plot, about which I am now to ſpeak, a plot which is merely the ſequel and the laſt thread of all the others, I muſt ſhortly deſcribe to you the hideous conſpiracies that have menaced public liberty. On the ſtage of the revolution, we have ſeen a great number of performers, the greater part of whom had ſufficient talents to do good, but wanted the heart and integrity to do ſo. It will be pleaſing to us, nevertheleſs, to ſee that all the wickedneſs with which tyrants reproach us, ſpring from themſelves; and that from their thrones have iſſned the rivers of corruption that have inundated France. We will follow the foreign powers ſtep by ſtep, and meaſure the route of their agents. England and all the inimical governments have perceived, that ſhould they attack us with one faction alone, that faction would be readily diſconcerted.—They therefore ſet on foot at one and the ſame time ſeveral factions, which are involved in each other, like the ſkies of Deſcartes, and the aim of which is the ſame, although they are not known mutually to each other. In the firſt place ſprang up, on the ruin of all principles, and with the progreſſion of every deſcription of crimes, though without energy and audacity, the faction called d'Orleans, after him whom it wiſhed to be placed on the throne: all the aſcendancy of Mirabeau, all the talents of Dumourier, were the inefficacious vehicles of this daſtardly faction. By federaliſm, which was to beſtow on each commune an independent authority, an endeavour was next made to corrupt with great facility the French nation, which would thus have been divided; a part of the convention was led into this opinion, and the members who became the accomplices of this treaſon, merited juſtly the fate they experienced. An infinity of other means have been practiſed to annihilate the republic; all of theſe have been deſtroyed, but new conſpirators have formed new plots from their ruins. At length, Hebert appeared on the political horizon; Hebert, who, to deceive the people, addreſſed them in a groſs language, Hebert, the partizan of royalty, the friend of Chabot, whom he afterwards ſtigmatized, but with whom he was to have ſupped on the evening of the day when the latter was apprehended. The league, at the head of which this Hebert was, was completely connected with the abortive plans of Briſſot and Carra; and around this new conſpiracy, the ſecret and moſt ſkilful partizans of the plots that had been defeated, rallied. Among theſe we ought to diſtinguiſh Fabre d'Eglantine, the panegyriſt of d'Orleans; a man ſupple, inſinuating, cunning, laborious, ſpeaking every tongue, flattering all the paſſions, tender of every party, daſtardly, ſubtle, a nice obſerver and propheſier of events, and one who obtained the eſteem of all, touching their paſſions, as a muſician tries, liſtens to, and determines the effect of the notes of his compoſition. Together with Petion, Carra, and Briſſot, he on the tenth of Auguſt implored the people in favour of the king. During the firſt ten months of the ſitting of this convention, he was ſilent; but obſerving the cataſtrophe of the contending parties, he made the finances his ſtudy, and ſpoke learnedly in all the diſcuſſions on financial matters. He ſoon perceived to what the deſtruction of public worſhip would lead; and becoming accordingly a loud declaimer againſt the eternal baſis of morality, he attacked providence, denied the immortality of the ſoul, which comforted Socrates when he ſwallowed the juice of hemlock, and wiſhed, in concert with his followers, to baniſh from nature the Supreme Being. At the head of this ſyſtem was Chaumette, the flatterer of the people, but the friend of kings; who, when he remitted thirty thouſand livres to his father, requeſted of him neither to purchaſe national domains, nor the confiſcated property of the emigrants. Let not the people loſe ſight of the divinity! Thoſe who made religion a pretext for the reſtoration of royalty, have endeavoured to diſſeminate among us the horrible doctrine of atheiſm. In the front of the latter, marched another party, the one which demanded the calling together of a new convention. The party pretended, that you were decayed; but the tyrants, ſome of whom have been the ſcourge of Europe for fifty years, are they decayed? Are the intrigues of our enemies, and the genius of counter-revolution decayed?

Are crimes more vigorous than virtue, and do they weary ſooner? Among the potentates of the earth, the firſt is the national repreſentation; for it conſiſts of the people. Can one ſingle man and the country be weighed in the ſame ſcale. From one end of Europe to the other, the ſtyle of patriotiſm is aſſumed; let us ſee, Danton, what the ſtyle of patriotiſm is? You conſpired with Mirabeau, Dumourier, Hebert and Herault. You ſought the protection of Mirabeau; and during his life you remained mute. This faction-monger knew the value of your audacity and diſplayed againſt the court a menacing front. He periſhed, and his death again plunged you in obſcurity. You appeared again in the Champ de Mars, and it was then that in the Jacobins you ſupported the motion of Laclos, and drew up with Briſſot the celebrated addreſs. You ſoon after, however, contrived, to enjoy tranquillity at Arcis-ſur-Aube; but on the night of the tenth of Auguſt you returned, and it required all the perſuaſion of your friends to keep you out of bed. When miniſter of juſtice, you were ſurrounded by knaves; and ſpeaking of Noel, one of your agents, you obſerved, that you knew him to be a good-for-nothing fellow, but you had him watched. Upon Fabre d'Eglantine you heaped riches; and it was by your influence that both he and d'Orleans were choſen for the convention. In this convention you were the friend of the Briſſotines, with whom you concerted ſham attacks to be made on yourſelf; and while they demanded your accounts, you preſented to them the olive-branch of peace. You talked of your indolence, but you well knew how to ſhake it off in the defence of Dumourier aud Weſtermann. Dumourier, Danton, Fabre-Fona, Fabre d'Eglantine, and Lacroix, are all of the ſame political faith, and of the ſame faction. If there is a reputation more tarniſhed than the reſt, it is that of Lacroix, on whom the public opinion has already pronounced. He has at all times been ſuſpected, and regarded as a man of immoral character. The defender of Miranda, and friend of Dumourier, he has an hundred times inveighed againſt the Jacobins, and has as often teſtified his hatred againſt them. The corruption of public morals was one of the arms of Lacroix, who, in concert with Danton, propoſed the baniſhment of Capet. Such, Danton, were your friends. Your robuſt make ſeemed to diſguiſe the feebleneſs of your counſels; you began like the thunder, but you never made a vigorous propoſition againſt the federaliſts. You ſeemed energetic, but your energy was falſe; and if, in the month of March 1793, on your return from Belgium, you cauſed a ferment in Paris, if you excited an inſurrection, it was to enable Dumourier to march to the capital with his army. Like Sextus Quintus, you pretended ſimplicity; but flaſhes of light ſoon dazzled the political tortoiſe, and made you appear a very camelion, giving a diverſity of colours to your crimes. Philipeaux was known by his writings againſt Marat, and for his appeal to the people: his works of a more recent date, betray the foreign pens by which they were dictated, and have occaſioned more than one revolt. Hebert delighted in repeating, that the revolution, like Saturn, would devour its children. No! it will devour no other than the friends of tyranny—not one true child of liberty will periſh. Danton and Lacroix talk in vain of clemency. Let us be inflexible: it is indulgence that is ferocious, when it protects the enemies of the people. In the territory of France, no other than freemen ſhould remain: let us, like Promotheus, ſteal from heaven the fire which ſhall deſtroy tyrants, and give life to the republic."

This report, frequently interrupted with applauſes, concluded with the following decree;—

The convention decrees the following deputies to be in a ſtate of accuſation—namely, Camille Deſmoulins, Herault, Danton, Philippeaux, and Lacroix. They are convicted of having plotted with d'Orleans, Dumourier, Fabre d'Eglantine, and other enemies of the republic; and of having ſhared in the conſpiracy which tended to re-eſtabliſh monarchy, and to deſtroy the national repreſentation, as well as the republican government. They are accordingly to be tried with Fabre d'Eglantine.

Theſe proceedings exhibit the moſt forcible picture of the combined influence of ambition and hypocriſy, of the rage to which the luſt of power will lead men. And how ready tyrants are to employ the revered authority of liberty and religion to ſanction crimes the moſt outrageous of their principles.

On the morning of the ſecond of April, Danton, Fabre d'Eglantine, Lacroix, Chabot, Philippeaux, Camille Deſmoulins, Delaunay of Angers, Herault Sechelles, the abbé d'Eſpagnac, Guſman, the two Freys, Diendrichien, and Lullier, were brought before the revolutionary tribunal, with the celebrated general Weſterman. It will be evident from the tranſactions already ſtated, that the charges againſt theſe perſons were the moſt oppoſite to each other. Hebert had been accuſed among other things of his calumnies on Fabre d'Eglantine and others; Fabre is now accuſed of thoſe things as counter-revolutionary which Hebert had been condemned for aſſerting. Camille Deſmoulins and Danton, whoſe names will ever live among thoſe of the founders of the republic and men of genius, were not accuſed of any connection with Fabre or his aſſociates; Danton had been a republican and a leader in the revolution before Robeſpierre was yet publicly known; and Camille on the day preceding the taking of the Baſtile, had the glory of being the firſt man in France who placed the national cockade in his hat, and calling his fellow-citizens to ſhake off the fetters of deſpotiſm. But Robeſpierre was not to be deterred from making them his victims by the conſiderations of gratitude or early affection. Danton had by his intrepidity and his eloquence reſcued Robeſpierre from an accuſation brought againſt him by Louvet for the maſſacres of September, and which excited ſo much indignation in the convention that he expected to be ſent to the ſcaffold. Camille had been his ſchoolfellow and early friend.

But Robeſpierre had always envied the ſuperior talents of Danton, and indeed he was ſo formidable a rival, that to ſucceed in his deſigns it was indiſpenſably neceſſary to remove Danton. It appears that the latter was not inſenſible to his danger, and was perfectly acquainted with the perfidious character of his rival. A few days before his arreſt, he had gone to a villa at ſome diſtance from Paris, and returned to town in the ſame carriage with Robeſpierre; the object of the viſit was to obtain a reconciliation; but after all Danton's remonſtrances and thoſe of a common friend, finding Robeſpierre implacable and that he eyed him with a ſarcaſtic malignity that expreſſed the black purpoſe of his ſoul, he left him with this prophetic exclamation—"I ſee that my fate is decided, but my "death will be your ruin."

The real crime of Camille was a ſatirical parallel between the revolutionary practices under Robeſpierre and the capricious tyranny of the Roman emperors, which he publiſhed in a periodical paper of which he was the editor called "The old Cordelier;" wherein he expanded the glowing preciſion of Tacitus into charges ſo extremely ludicrous, that they found an echo in every heart but that of the tyrant, upon whoſe ſoul they inflicted tortures incurable.

Philippeaux was among the moſt to be regretted of the deputies; his heart open to the impreſſions of tenderneſs, had reported with great feeling the horrors he had witneſſed in La Vendée, whence he had lately returned from a miſſion.

Fabre's crimes were certainly not againſt the revolution, admitting even the truth of his concern in ſtock-jobbing; he poſſeſſed fine talents for literature, was an excellent poet, and had written a celebrated comedy called Phelinthe. It has been ſaid of him that the ſpirit of intrigue which prevails in his comedy diſtinguiſhed him as a legiſlator. The love of fame, however, continued to prevail even over the fear of death, and his laſt cares were fixed upon a comedy which he had cauſed to be depoſited with the committee of public ſafety, leſt Billaud Varennes ſhould claim the credit of having written it.

At the tribunal Fabre alone appeared agitated. Danton maintained a hilarity that mortified his accuſers, he had made up his mind to his fate; when the uſual queſtion was put to him concerning his name and reſidence, he replied—" my reſidence will ſoon be a nonentity; but my name will forever live in the pantheon of hiſtory." Herault Sechelles being aſked the ſame queſtion, ſaid he formerly poſſeſſed a ſeat in that hall where he was deteſted as the decided friend of liberty. Chabot took poiſon, but it was counteracted by an emetic. Camille and Herault entertained the ſpectators by completely turning the act of accuſation into ridicule; and Danton perplexed the judges by the keeneſt ſallies of wit and pointed invective. His contempt for the tribunal he diſplayed by every means in his power, and amuſed himſelf with throwing little balls of paſte in the faces of the judges. This conduct it was which was the pretext for and application to the convention, and produced that decree, propoſed by St. Juſt, which prohibited the hearing of contumacious culprits.

The priſoners loudly demanded to be confronted with the tyrant, whom they accuſed of being afraid to look in the face of innocence, they lamented that they had not ſucceſsfully conſpired againſt him, and declared that " Nothing would be more glorious than to conſpire " againſt a government which itſelf conſpired." Robeſpierre however had abſented himſelf from the convention and refuſed to attend, upon a pretence that a plot was formed to aſſaſſinate him at the tribunal—They refuſed to anſwer interrogatories unleſs their accuſers, Robeſpierre, St. Juſt, and Barrere, were compelled to attend, and confronted with them to give evidence. The jury therefore found Danton, Camille, Lacroix, Philippaux, Herault, and Weſterman, guilty of conſpiracy againſt the republic; Chabot, Fabre, Julien, d'Eſpagnac, the two Freys, Guſman, and Diendrichien, guilty of corrupt practices; and acquitted Lullier. Delaunay appears not to have been tried.

At two o'clock the ſame day ſentence of death was paſſed; and at five in the afternoon they were conveyed in three carts from the Conciergerie to the place de la revolution. They all behaved with the moſt magnanimous reſolution except Lacroix; Danton, while the condemned deputies were getting into the carts, amuſed the crowd with many ſportive obſervations; on his way to the ſcaffold he continued his jocularity; his head which was bare, ſtruck many perſons with a reſemblance of Socrates He was the laſt perſon executed, and when tied to the plank, he caſt his eyes towards the fatal knife, and his countenance and figure aſſumed an air of magnanimity with which the ſpectators were deeply penetrated.

Danton was a native of Arcy-ſur-Aube in the department of Calais; he had been educated for the bar. But his talents were ſuperior to his education. From the firſt firſt dawn of the revolution he had taken an active part, in his own commune and in the capital. His popularity commenced in the Cordeliers club, to which his talents gave a celebrity that excited the envy of the ambitious. He was originally intimate, beloved in and loved the Gironde party. Their characters, however, did not poſſeſs that energy which he deemed expedient in a revolution; he acted with them however in counteracting the flight of the court in Auguſt, 1792; he was the principal contriver of the affair of the tenth, and patroniſed Weſterman, who commanded the citizens on that occaſion, and who at length fell on the ſame ſcaffold on the ſame day with him. He had early foreſeen that the impulſe which then actuated France would lead to her emancipation from deſpotiſm. When he became diſtinguiſhed at the Cordeliers, the great places of the revolution were already pre-occupied in that dangerous ſyſtem of limitted liberty which admits of a throne. Danton ſtill wiſhed for a place ſuited to his genius, and he it was that firſt conceived the plan of turning France into a republic.

There are two ways which may be taken, in order to accompliſh a great political change in a ſtate. Either the innovators produce a change of opinion, which of courſe changes powers and inſtitutions; or they overthrow inſtitutions and powers, by which a conſequent change of opinion is alſo effected.—The firſt way is the longeſt; and it is to be ſlowly travelled. The ſecond is not a road, but a precipice that is to be leaped over; it requires but one bold leap, and but a moment of time.—It was the latter which beſt ſuited the boldneſs, the ſluggiſhneſs, the ardent yet indolent character of Danton.

He had in him ſomething which cannot be deſcribed, but which drew men about him, to make themſelves his inſtruments, and to await his orders. Petty ſucceſſes he never conteſted with any one; and this was the reaſon why all concurred to aid him in attaining the greateſt ſucceſſes.

When you firſt approached him, his figure and voice were terrible. He knew it, and was not ill pleaſed with the idea; for the more fear he commanded, ſo much the leſs ill was he obliged to do.

When once Mirabeau was thoroughly corrupted, the court then employed all their means of corruption, in order to get in the ſame way at Danton; but he remained faithful to the republicans.

After the twentieth of June, every one began to make his court at the caſtle, which was apparently riſing in power. Danton prepared the events of the tenth of Auguſt; and the caſtle was no more.

This was the motion, this the decree, that truly created the republic.

Thoſe days of glory were nearly allied to the ſecond and third of September; and Danton has been accuſed as a partner in all the guilt and horrors of the latter.—But it is known, that, while thoſe bloody men with whom he had been aſſociated by the greateſt victory of liberty, cut off men who were all moſt innocent and peaceful, Danton hiding his pity under the roarings of his voice, ſnatched on the right-hand, and on the left, as many victims as poſſible from ſlaughter; and theſe acts of his humanity at that very period were afterwards recorded as crimes againſt the revolution, in the act of accuſation, which hurried him to the ſcaffold.

Conducted at once to the miniſtry, and into the convention, Danton too well knew the revolution and human nature, not to be aware, that to continue a miniſter, would be but to expoſe himſelf to certain ruin; and he reſigned an executive power which placed the unfortunate perſons entruſted with it, abſolutely at the mercy of any one who deſired to cruſh them.

On the other hand, what a field for glory, and for the expanſion of mind, did not the convention preſent to thoſe legiſlators who were employed to give to a nation of five and twenty millions of men, a republican conſtitution?

Danton had never regulary ſtudied the works of thoſe philoſophers who have, for about a century now paſt, deduced from the nature of man, the principles of the ſocial art. He had looked only into his own meditations for thoſe vaſt yet ſimple combinations which the organization of a vaſt empire requires. But his natural capacity, which was very great, and was as yet unoccupied, naturally excluded vague, complex, and falſe notions, and as naturally opened itſelf to receive thoſe truths of experience, which were confirmed by ſatisfactory evidence.

He had that invention, that inſtinctive apprehenſion of the great, which conſtitutes geniüs; and that ſilent circumſpection in which conſiſts the majeſty of reaſon.

Danton never wrote or printed a diſcourſe. He uſed to ſay, I never write. This has been, in different ages, the caſe with ſeveral extraordinary men, who have paſſed over the earth leaving on it their words and diſciples, but none of their writings.—They muſt no doubt have felt that they could not write in a ſtile worthy of their characters or of their ideas.

The great models of ancient eloquence were almoſt as little known to him, as the views of modern philoſophy. But thoſe ardent expreſſions uttered amidſt the burſts of paſſion, and by the moſt illuſtrous characters, which the literature of antiquity has preſerved us—thoſe words which, from age to age, have been reſounded in every ear,—were deeply engraven on his memory; and their forms had, without thinking of it, become the ordinary forms of the ſallies of his character, and of his paſſions.

His imagination, and that ſpecies of eloquence, an eloquence ſingulary adapted to his figure, his voice and his ſtature,—were thoſe of a great leader. His firſt view of men and of things, were quick, correct, and impartial. He poſſeſſed that ſolid practical prudence, which experience alone can confer.

He knew hardly any thing. He did not pretend to foreſee. But he opened his eyes, and beheld.

In public aſſemblies, he uttered ſome expreſſions which were long remembered. In private company, he was ſilent, and liſtened with intereſted attention when thoſe around him talked little; with aſtoniſhment when they ſaid a great deal—he excited Camille Deſmoulins to ſpeak, becauſe his genius diſdained to trifle, and his eloquence was dignified and pure; he endured the prattle of Fabre d'Eglantine—only becauſe it was poetical, and relieved the ſeverity of profound abſtraction.

Such was the man who was almoſt adored by his friends, and whom his enemies ought to have treated with that delicacy and forbearance which the intereſts of the republic demanded.

But his enemies, to whom he was of all men the moſt formidable, ever believed him to be the moſt dangerous of men to the republic. All the faults of his party were attributed to him, becauſe he did not prevent them: his power was repreſented as enormous, on purpoſe to defame and ruin him.---Marat was ſaid to be but a ribbald and madman; Robeſpierre but an oratorical dictator; and becauſe Danton alone had talents fitted to accompliſh a grand project of ambition, he was ſuppoſed to be continually buſied about ſuch a project.

Danton ſaw his ſafety endangered by the fears which he commanded; and could not but uſe means for his defence.

At the very time when the right ſide had the majority, he had loudly called for a government, and this not more from fear of the miſchief which his enemies might do to him and his party, than of that miſchief which his party and he might do to their enemies. If his friends and he might be but ſafe, it appeared to him a matter of indifference, whether the paſſions of all ſhould be ſuppreſſed by the public force, or ſhould be ſacrificed by the prudence of the leaders of the parties.

He believed, he ſaw—himſelf to be always menaced; it was actually ſo. To ſave himſelf and his friends, therefore, he overleaped all the barriers—By him were demanded the revolutionary tribunal, the revolutionary army, the revolutionary committees, the forty ſols of daily pay to the members of the ſections. He ſtruck on all ſides with his trident; and on all ſides furious tempeſts aroſe.

Hardly had he ſeen his firſt dangers removed from before him, by the decrees of the thirty-firſt of May, when he diveſted himſelf of his power, and turned all his cares to ſave thoſe who unfortunately were already loſt. They had been given up to Robeſpierre and Billaud. Billaud and Robeſpierre eagerly graſped at the government, when the ſeaſon of combat was over, and nothing remained but to rear and to crowd the ſcaffolds with victims.

Obſerve from that moment, the train of Danton's conduct in the national convention: you will ſee him buſied in marking out for himſelf an oblique path, in which he might ſeek at once his own ſafety and the ſafety of the members over whom he had gained a victory that gave him more ſorrow than joy. He uttered cries for vengeance by which the vaulted roof of the ſanctuary of the laws was ſhaken, yet at the ſame time ſuggeſted meaſures by which the cruelties of vengeance might be averted.—All the extravagance and fury of the demagogue were but feigned.—Love of order, of juſtice, of humanity, was the ſentiment which prevailed in his heart. He affected a barbarity of ſoul, in order to retain his popularity, that he might be able to bring back the people to a due reſpect for the laws, and for the lives of their fellows.

When the fate deſtined to the two and thirty appeared to be inevitable; Danton heard, ſo to ſpeak, his own death-warrant in theirs. All his ſtrength ſunk to feebleneſs, oppreſſed by the ſenſe of the revolutionary diſorders and crimes.—He could no longer talk of aught but the country. He felt a ſuffocation at his heart.—He needed to retire from the preſence of men, in order to reſpire freely. At his native place of Arcis-ſur-Aube, the aſpect of nature, while it calmed the anxieties of his breaſt, inſpired him with generous and magnanimous reſolutions—In the ſilence of the country and of retreat, he conceived the deſign of a new and benevolent conſpiracy. All his friends entered into it.

He often ſpoke in a tone of candour and deſpair, of the quarrels in the convention, of the errors of others, of his own and the unfortunate events which they had occaſioned.--- "Twenty times," ſaid he to a friend one day, "did I make them offers of peace; "they refuſed to believe me; that they might ſtill remain at liberty to deſtroy me: they

"forced us to take refuge in the arms of ſanſculottiſm, which has deſtroyed them, "which will deſtroy us all, which will at laſt deſtroy itſelf."

The deſign and plan of Danton's conſpiracy, although carefully concealed, were however very evident.

Its deſign was to reſtore for the benefit of all, the reign of juſtice and of the laws, and to extend clemency to his enemies; to recal into the convention, thoſe of its members who had been expelled from it, reciprocally granting to them, and requiring from them, a general amneſty; to ſubject to the moſt thorough examination of the repreſentatives of France, of the whole nation, of all Europe, that conſtitution of 1793, which had been framed by five or ſix young perſons in the ſpace of five or ſix days, but which ought to have been the maſterpiece of the beſt efforts of human genius, ſince it was to be the firſt model upon earth, of a democracy of five and twenty millions of men; to offer peace to the powers of Europe, yet ſtill continue to defeat them; to raiſe commerce and induſtry up from their ruins, by giving them unlimited liberty; arts and ſciences from their ſtate of ſhattered decline, by holding out to them magnificent encouragements; to annihilate all the barriers dividing department from department; and put an end to thoſe inquiſitions which looked upon cards, and into port-folios, for proofs of a civiſm which can have no exiſtence except in ſouls which are exempted from all ſuch inquiſition; to regard as the only cards of ſecurity to the republic,---good laws, a good government, their armies, and victories.

The meaſures by which he propoſed to carry his conſpiracy into execution, were,---to prepare the minds of men for ſuch a change, by means of ſuch papers as thoſe of Camille Deſmoulins;--- to open a communication and a mutual underſtanding between the left ſide of the convention, and the remaining members of the right ſide;—to put an end to that diviſion which had laid them both at the mercy of tyrannical committees;--- to regard none but Collot, St. Juſt, and Couthon, as irrecoverably attached to the exterminating ſyſtem;--to try to detach Barrere from them by addreſſing the humanity of his heart;---ſtill to augment the power of the committee of public ſafety, becauſe ambition, when diveſted of private views, could not be too ſtrongly armed to accompliſh the public welfare,---and becauſe, ſhould it, on the contrary, continue to employ new powers ſtill in the perpetration of new crimes, its authority becoming every day more odious, would proceed from crime to crime, with that inſolence and effrontery, which are always the ultimate exceſſes, and the termination of tyranny;-- in ſhort, to accompliſh either by gradual movements, or by ſome impetuous unexpected effort, a total or partial renovation of the two committees; and by a fortunate irruption, to introduce into the government, thoſe grand, generous, and patriotic views, with which the conſpiracy had been conceived.

The ſole ambition of Danton at this period was, by accompliſhing a grand and laſting good to mankind, to make amends for thoſe terrible but tranſient miſchiefs which anarchy had occaſioned to France;---to extinguiſh by a democracy organiſed with profound wiſdom, all the delirium and diſaſters of fanaticiſm; to make the revolution expire under a republican government, ſufficiently powerful and brilliant to eſtabliſh an eternal alliance between order and liberty; to ſecure the happineſs of his country; to give peace to Europe; to return then to Arcis-ſur-Aube, and grow old in indolent retirement, with his children around him, and cultivating his farm.

To this grandeur of ſentiment and views, had the ſoul of Danton been raiſed by that ſame conſpiracy which animated the genius of Camille Deſmoulins with all Tacitus's profoundity and elevation of thought. Thoſe who ſhall be ſurpriſed at it, will by their ſurpriſe declare, that they know what effects can be produced on a ſoul that has not yet ceaſed to be ſuſceptible of the tender affections of nature---by thoſe reproaches of conſcience which urge it to embrace virtue as an altar at which every crime may be expiated; that they know not how much the views of virtue can do, to create, or to exalt human genius--.Danton dying for the cauſe of humanity, was ſeen to turn his looks towards that heaven which he was truly worthy to behold. Whatever might be his faults, virtue muſt, throughout every future age, bear witneſs for him in reſpect to two things:---he overturned the throne; and he periſhed on the ſcaffold for having wiſhed to ſtop the effuſion of human blood, which flowed in torrents by the hands of the executioner, and upon the very foundations of the republic.

The principle once admitted of puniſhing upon ſuſpicion and not on evidence, no boundaries can be preſcribed to vice or paſſion. The letter of la Flotte which had been laid before the convention, was now employed as the foundation of further murders. Arthur Dillon, an Iriſh general, who had formerly commanded that diviſion of the army which at the paſs of Beiſme in the foreſt of Argonne in 1792, repulſed the Pruſſians and ſaved France, was an intimate friend of Camille Deſmoulins, and was naturally intereſted in the fate of his friend. The baſeneſs of la Flotte had led him, in order to ſav his own life, to betray his converſations with Dillon; and Camille having fallen, his unfortunate and beautiful widow was comprehended in the liſt of the proſcribed. By one of thoſe ſingul r chances of which the revolution was ſo fruitful, the wife of Hebert was led to the ſcaffold on the ſame day; Madame Deſmoulins who deplored her huſband with the moſt virtuous ſorrow, felt an heroic conſolation at ſuffering ſo ſoon on the ſame ſcaffold; and comtemplated with rapture the flattering hope of being reunited to her huſband in a happier ſtate of exiſtence. Her charms which were of a ſuperior order were adorned by a ſwee: and ſerene ſmile on her way to execution; the people as ſhe paſſed along frequently exclaimed—"How beautiful ſhe is!—How mild ſhe looks—What a pity "'tis that ſhe ſhould ſuffer." at the foot of the ſcaffold ſhe embraced the wife of Hebert, bad farewell to her friends, and met her fate with angelic ſerenity. Dillon who ſuffered with he· met his death with a dignified compoſure.

Along with them alſo ſuffered general Beyſſer, accuſed of counter-revolutionary practices in la Vendée where he commanded. Chaumette, one of the principal agents of Robeſpierre in the proſcriptions of the thirty-firſt of May, and Gobet who had been archbiſhop of Paris, and had renounced this prieſthood for the worſhip of the popular gods of the day; the only charge againſt theſe two were their atheiſm. Robeſpierre had adored the goddeſs ef reaſon till the church was deſpoiled of thoſe treaſures with which ſuperſtition enriched it, Chaumette continued his devotions, but his real crime was that of Hebert, a knowledge of the vices of Robeſpierre. Gobet was in his ſixty-ſeventh year, and appears to have been executed only as a cover to the death of Chaumette.

At this period, however, terror had arrived at its higheſt tenſion; and from ſeeing a ſucceſſion of able and virtuous men ſent to the ſcaffold in conjunction with real traitors, the convention began to feel and recover from the ſtate of degradation in which they were ſinking. A deputation from the popular ſociety at Cette appeared at the bar on the fourth of April, and delivered an addreſs by its ſpokeſman containing ſentiments adapted to the ſanguinary ſpirit of the tyrant,—they wiſhed "death to be the order of the day. Marat ſaid off with 500,000 heads, and liberty is ſecured for ever," they recommended ſimilar principles. The preſident however ſignified to the deputation "not death but juſtice ſhould be the order of the day. That their language was unworthy of republicans, and the citizens in the galleries had proved by their murmurs that they did not ſhare their ſentiments---in ſpite of thoſe who wiſh to annihilate all public and private virtue—republicans will not ſuffer themſelves to be diſgraced by bloodſhed—virtue and juſtice, ſhould be the motto of Frenchmen---report this anſwer to thoſe who ſent you."---

The convention loudly applauded this ſpeech of the preſident, and ſeveral voices, exclaimed to turn out the deputation from the hall, and they were accordingly expelled.

On the 6th of April the convention decreed on the motion of Couthon—"that every deputy ſhould be obliged, upon pain of death to give an account of his revenue before and ſince the revolution." This was profeſſedly intended to obviate a repetition of the ſpeculation of which ſome of the condemned deputies had been accuſed; but really to throw odium on their memory and to ſpread terror more widely.

On the fifteenth of April St. Juſt made a report on the general police of the republic, in which he took a retroſpect of the revolution and endeavoured to unfold a variety of anomalous combinations—of Necker with Orleans, in forming the number of the tiers etat; of Necker and Mirabeau, to eſtabliſh monarchy, under a falſe pretence of liberty; of Danton, Ducos, Fonfrede, Dumourier, Ronſin, acting in concert, to introduce ariſtocracy.

He deſcribed Marat as mild in his deportment but terrible to traitors, and aſſerted that Rouſſeau profeſſed the ſame virtues. The tyrants of Europe had derived their power from the ſanction of ſeveral ages of folly; that the republic was eſtabliſhed by five years reſiſtance againſt that folly. Who in the times of Pompey, he aſked, were the parents of the exiſting race of kings? They were all but the grand children of labourers, ſailors, ſoldiers, or robbers. At his death the tyrant of France bequeathed civil wars; that the legacy would remain until the executors were deſtroyed. He noticed an expreſſion of Earl Stanhope in the Engliſh Houſe of Peers, who had declared that the Engliſh government had employed every artifice of treachery and bribery—of revolts and calumny—to deſtroy the French national repreſentation. He concluded as uſual with profeſſing the moſt ſacred reverence for religious worſhip and the divinity.

On the ſixteenth Couthon produced a decree founded on this report, by which all aliens belonging to the countries at war with the republic, and all ex-nobles were ordered to depart from Paris, and from all fortreſſes and maritime towns. This decree, however, is ſo important that it merits a particular record; the following is a copy of it:—

Art. I. All perſons accuſed of conſpiracy, in any quarter of the Republic, ſhall be conducted to Paris, in order to be tried by the Revolutionary Tribunal of that Capital.

II. The Committees of Public and General Safety ſhall immediately take meaſures to arreſt all accomplices of conſpirators, and ſhall order them to be conducted before the above Tribunal.

III. Popular commiſſions ſhall be eſtabliſhed on the fifteenth of Floreal next.

IV. All adminiſtrations and civil courts of juſtice are ordered to decide upon all pending ſuits, within three months after the publication of this decree, under the penalty of being deprived of their functions. All private law-ſuits ſhall, for the future, alſo be terminated within the above fixed time, under the ſame penalty to the judges.

V. The Committee of Public Safety is expreſsly charged to inſpect the conduct of all the public authorities and agents of the government, whoſe duty it is to co-operate in the adminiſtration of public buſineſs.

VI. No ex-noble, nor foreigner from a country with which the Republic is at war, is allowed to ſojourn in Paris, any fortreſs of the Republic, nor any maritime town, during the preſent war. Every noble or ſtranger under the above circumſtances, who ſhall remain in Paris, &c. within ten days after the publication of this law, ſhall be declared outlawed.

VII. Workmen employed in the manufactories of arms at Paris, foreign women married to French patriots, and noble women married to citizens not noble, are not included in the former article.

VIII. Foreigners, workmen, who had lived upon their labor previous to this decree, or dealers in detail ſettled previous to this decree; children under the age of fifteen, and old men above the age of ſeventy, are likewiſe exempted from the rigour of this law.

IX. Exception, with reſpect to nobles and foreigners in the armies, are referred to the Committee of Public Safety: this being a meaſure of government.

X. The Committee of Public Safety is equally authoriſed to retain, by a ſpecial requiſition, all ci-devant nobles, and foreigners, whom it might judge uſeful to the Republic.

XI. The Revolutionary Committees are authoriſed to deliver paſſports; and thoſe who ſhall obtain them, ſhall be obliged to declare the place whither they intend to retire, and the name of the declared place ſhall be mentioned in the paſſport.

XII. The Revolutionary Committees ſhall keep exact regiſters of all the paſſports they ſhall diſtribute: and an extract of ſuch regiſters ſhall be daily delivered to the Committees of Public and General Safety.

XIII. The ci-devant nobles and foreigners above-mentioned, are obliged to produce their paſſports before the municipality of the place where they intend to reſide; they are, moreover, obliged to make daily their perſonal appearance before the municipality of the place of their reſidence.

XIV. The municipalities are ordered to ſend to the Committees of General and Public Safety, a liſt of all the ci-devant nobles and foreigners living in their juriſdiction, or of ſuch as lately arrived there, with paſſports according to the letter of this decree.

XV. The ci-devant nobles and foreigners ſhall not be admitted members of Popular Societies, of the Committees of Inſpection, of Aſſemblies of the Communes, nor of thoſe of the ſections.

XVI. Generals are prohibited from reſiding at Paris, in fortified places, or in maritime towns, unleſs commanded thither in the courſe of actual ſervice.

XVII. Proper reſpect ſhall be paid by citizens to their magiſtrates: every citizen, however, has a right to complain againſt them, in caſe they are unjuſt, to the Committee of Public Safety, which will puniſh them according to the rigour of the law.

XVIII. The National Convention enjoins all public authorities ſtrictly to confine themſelves within the limits of their inſtitution, neither to extend nor to reſtrict their powers.

XIX. The Committee of Public Safety is ordered to require punctual accounts to be rendered to them, of the operations and conduct of all public agents, to profecute with the utmoſt ſeverity thoſe who ſhall have favoured conſpiracies, and who ſhall have turned againſt liberty that power with which they have been intruſted.

XX. Every citizen is obliged to give information to the public authorities within his diſtrict, or to the Committee of Public Safety, of every theft which ſhall come within his knowledge, of uncivic ſpeeches held, and acts of oppreſſion committed againſt themſelves and others, within their knowledge.

XXI. The repreſentatives of the people may employ the conſtituted authorities in the execution of what may be neceſſary for the public weal, but can never delegate their own powers to others.

XXII. No authority has the power of ordering requiſitions, except the commiſſion of proviſions, and the repreſentatives of the people with the armies, under the ſpecial authorization of the Committee of Public Safety.

XXIII. Any body convicted of having complained againſt the Revolution, at the ſame time leading an idle life, being neither of the age of ſixty, nor afflicted with infirmities, ſhall be condemned to the puniſhment of tranſportation to the Iſland of Guianna, after having been tried before the popular commiſſions.

XXIV. The Committee of Public Safety ſhall encourage, by indemnifications and rewards, manufactories, the exploration of mines, and the draining of marſhes; ſhall protect induſtry, promote due confidence between traders, ſhall advance proper ſums to patriotic merchants, who engage to procure proviſions; ſhall guarantee the goods which are imported into Paris; ſhall watch over the ſafety of the circulation of the goods in the interior of the Republic, and ſhall puniſh every attempt made againſt property.

XXV. Two commiſſions ſhall be appointed, each compoſed of three members of the Convention; one to be charged to collect, in an abridged and complete manner, all the laws which have been made unto this day, in order to form a correct national code of laws, at the ſame time ſuppreſſing ſuch laws as ſhall have become confuſed. The other commiſſion ſhall form a civil code of the exiſting civil laws and inſtitutions for the preſervation of the morals of the citizens, and of the ſpirit of liberty. A report of thoſe ſubjects ſhall be made by the ſaid commiſſions, within a month's time after their eſtabliſhment.

XXVI. The preſent decree ſhall be proclaimed to-morrow in Paris; and the inſertion in the Bulletin ſhall give it the due publication in the departments.

The Committee of Public Safety publiſhed an order, by which, according to the tenth article of the above decree, all military perſons, in actual ſervice in the Republic, are declared in a ſtate of requiſition, and ſhall remain at their reſpective poſts. (Signed) Barrere, Carnot, Couthon, Billaud-Varennes, Robeſpierre.

On the ſeventeenth of April an account was laid before the convention of patriotic gifts made by the inhabitants of Bourdeaux; it appeared that from the firſt of Frimaire (twenty-firſt of November, 1793,) to the twentieth of Germinal, (fifth of April, 1794,) they had given 2,134,680 livres in ſpecie or aſſignats, including the expence of fitting out a man of war, 12,542 ſwords, 23,123 firelocks, 150,000 pounds of iron, 130,000 pounds of lead, 200 oak trees for the navy, and 50,049 ſhirts for the citizens defenders of the country. Theſe donations coming from the department of the Gironde, whoſe deputies had been ſacrificed by the tyrant, exhibit the national zeal in a very ſtong point of view.

On the eighteenth of April the caſe of Maria Cecilia, the daughter of Achmet III. ſultan of Turkey, was laid before the convention by the committee of ſuccour. It appeared that ſhe was eighty years of age, had fled to France at the age of ſixteen, and had lived on a penſion of three thouſand livres thence to 1789, when it was reduced to one thouſand and fifty, and during the laſt eight months had not been paid. It was decreed that the citizen Maria Cecilia ſhould be immediately ſupplied with ſix hundred livres, and a proviſional aid, and that arrangements ſhould be made for enſuring her an ample ſubſiſtence during her life.

The rage of proſcription had however not yet ceaſed; but to relieve the mind from the ungracious reflections which ſuch relations excite, it may be proper to take up the operations of the armies from the concluſion of the laſt campaign; but firſt it will be neceſſary to advert to the ſtate of affairs in La Vendée, where, in the tranſactions of 1793, the diſcomfiture and diſperſion of the malcontents has been noticed.

By a report to the convention on the twenty-ſecond of February, by Carrier, who had returned from a miſſion thither, it appeared that there had been ſixteen diſtricts in revolt, and the inhabitants of the whole country from the Loire to the ſea, from Painbœuf to Saumur, a ſpace of more than forty miles, were in arms.

The rebels were divided into ſeveral columns. Whenever they wanted reinforcements they ſounded the alarm-bell and ſet the wind.mills going, whoſe ſails ſerved for ſignals, and immediately a large force was collected. In Auguſt, 1793, they had amounted to 150,000 men in arms; but the victories obtained over them at Montagne and Cholet were ſo fatal, that the reporter had paſſed over fourteen leagues of country entirely covered with dead bodies, heaped in ſome places to the number of twelve over each other.

After theſe defeats they paſſed the Loire to the number of fifty thouſand, women and children included. On the left ſide of the Loire, Charette the principal leader ſtill remained with an active army in the heart of La Vendée. Their general however acknowleged that in the battle of Montagne alone 20,000 rebels fell by the ſword. Generals Dutruy and Hoye were charged to purſue Charette, and they obtained over him fifteen ſucceſſive victories.

Theſe conteſts were always terrible and deſparate, and even the women and children, infuriated by ſuperſtitious incitements, engaged in the conteſts; at the battle of Cholet, when the republicans for a moment gave way, and the rebels were thought victorious, the women ruſhed forward with knives in their hands and mixed in the conflict, ſtabbing the republicans and deſtroying ſuch as fell wounded.

The rebels were ſtill far from being wholly ſubdued. The foreſts, mountains, and natural receſſes of that luxuriant and romantic country afforded them an aſylum. A party of them however which eſcaped to the iſland of Noirmoutier did not make that deſparate ſtand which their critical ſituation appeared to encourage and require. Though the town was remarkably well calculated for defence, they ſurrendered at diſcretion on the third of January, even before the republicans had reached the batteries. In the reduction of the iſland five hundred of the royaliſts were killed and twelve hundred taken priſoners: fifty pieces of cannon, eight thouſand ſtands of arms, and thirty thouſand pounds of powder, fell into the hands of the republicans.

The fanatic rage of the rebels excited the moſt fell and deſparate retaliation. Nantz had been the centre of their reſources, and the rendezvous of their chiefs and foreign abettors. On the fifteenth of February five hundred of the rebels were publicly ſhot. From the numbers that fell and the ſummary mode of trial, there is too much reaſon to believe that many innocent perſons ſuffered. Even the guillotine was conſidered as too ſlow an inſtrument of death, and numbers of the unfortunate and deluded rebels were ſhot to death with grape-ſhot diſcharged from artillery; others were confined in barges, which were ſent out into deep waters, where they were ſcuttled and ſunk. It has been aſſerted that four thouſand perſons were drowned in that way. Theſe accounts however have been publiſhed by royaliſts or enemies to the revolution, whoſe accounts may be ſuppoſed to be exaggerated.

This immenſe inſurrection being for the preſent ſubdued, the republic was enabled to attend to the great concerns of the campaign againſt the allies. The army of the north had now enjoyed a ſhort but neceſſary repoſe, after ſeveral months of brilliant ſucceſs. Jourdan, however, had notwithſtanding the energy and ſucceſs of his plans, loſt the confidence of Rebeſpierre. His ſteady attachment to principles, and his ſentiments concerning the proſcriptions, had been reported to the committee of public ſafety, and Robeſpierre propoſed his removal. Nothing but the exemplary poverty of the general, the ſimplicity of his manners, and the total diſconnection from party, now ſaved him from the ſcaffold. In vain were cauſes of complaint ſought after; and diſappointed in the ſearch, the motive for his removal was at length fixed to be not for want of energy in what he had already atchieved, but for want of energy in what yet remained to be done. Pichegru, who had ſignalized himſelf by his attachment to the Jacobins, from whom he derived his rank in the army, and with whom he always communicated upon his tactics, with the ſame punctuality as with the committees, was now propoſed to be placed at the head of the army from which Jourdan was removed.

The report on this occaſion ſays—"after our ſucceſs at Maubege, the committee prepared a plan for driving the enemy from the territory of the republic. For the execution of this plan, great boldneſs was neceſſary in the general. This quality is wanting in Jourdan, who ſeems to have forgot the maxim 'that nothing is done while any thing remains to be done;' the committee thought that he ſhould be replaced by Pichegru, who poſſeſſes all that Jourdan wants. The latter may return home for ſome time, but not as ſuſpected generals do; he ſhall obtain an honorable retreat, worthy of his probity and patriotiſm. He is poor, and the conquerer of Maubege ought to receive a teſtimony of the national gratitude. We propoſe to you to grant him the penſion fixed by law."

In the latter end of January the French eſtabliſhed ſeveral redoubts in the environs of Maroilles, and the fire from theſe works conſiderably annoyed the advanced poſts of the allies. The allies however detached a diviſion acroſs the Sambre, and attacked the redoubts and killed five hundred of the republicans. The French in turn made an attempt on the twentieth of January, on the poſts of Aelback but without ſucceſs; they ſucceeded from Waterloo, with nine hundred infantry and one hundred cavalry, and by an impetuous onſet obliged the Auſtrians at firſt to retire; but the Auſtrians ſoon rallied and compelled them to retreat in turn with the loſs of twenty-two men.

M.DE LAFAYETTE.

Theſe petty ſkirmiſhes were but preludes to the vaſt plans that were about to unfold themſelves. Both ſides had made the moſt vigorous preparations. The combined powers had formed a plan different from thoſe of the former campaigns. It was the plan of colonel Mack, an Auſtrian adventurer. The princes and the nobles of Germany had been baffled by the plebeian genius of the republic, and compelled to ſeek in the talents of this ſon of an obſcure tradeſman, ſome dernier reſource to retrieve their fortunes and ſecure their cauſe from the overwhelming force that had been conjured up againſt them. Mack had proceeded to London with the duke of York in the month of February, in order to concert with the Britiſh miniſters and ſuch men of military talents as were collected in that capital, the operations of the campaign; and it appeared that in order to accompliſh the new project, the emperor had agreed to ſend a reinforcement of thirty-one thouſand men to the army. It was recommended to Pruſſia to augment her force to eighty thouſand.

The French project was ſaid to be very ſimple; it was to penetrate with a ſtrong column through the country of Namur and Liege; while a ſtronger column ſhould attack the Auſtrian cantonments near Tournay, and blockade Conde, Queſnoy, and Valenciennes. This plan however was betrayed to the allies by an officer who deſerted.

There appeared, however, among the allies a ſpirit of relaxation and jealouſy, which augured little ſucceſs. The abandonment of Weiſſembourg and the raiſing the ſiege of Landau in the preceding campaign, appear to have completely diſheartened the duke of Brunſwick. About the end of January of this year a remarkable publication appeared at Berlin, entitled "an official report of the events which took place from the thirteenth of "December, 1793, to the fourth of January, 1794. With notes by an officer, who "was an occular witneſs of all the events."—This officer was the duke of Brunſwick himſelf, and as an hiſtorical document of the firſt moment, ſhall be preſented here in abſtract.

After a ſhort exordium explanatory of the nature of the ſervice, and expreſſive of candid intentions and much regret on the ſtate of affairs, the writer proceeds—'When the duke of Brunſwick by his victory near Moorlautern, had prevented the French from penetrating on that ſide to Landau, he foreſaw, that for this purpoſe they would direct all their efforts againſt general Wurmſur's right wing. He therefore, repeatedly adviſed that general to quit his precarious poſition behind the Motter, and to occupy the much more advantageous one behind the Saar. So far back as the twelfth of October, he adviſed the count de Wurmſer to take this poſition, and his advice he repeated on the eight of December, very particularly. But all his remonſtrations being in vain, he did every thing in his power to ſupport the right wing of the Imperialiſts by reinforcing the Pruſſian poſts in the vale of Onweiler, and repaired in perſon on the thirteenth of December, to Bergzabern, to be nearer at hand for making ſuch diſpoſitions, as circumſtances might require.

'On the ſame day the enemy forced the poſt of Tannbruck, and the next day made themſelves maſters of the wood of Marienthal, and the height of Kraehenburg. On the ſifteenth, the Imperialiſts, ſupported by the prince of Brunſwick, baffled all the attempts of the republicans againſt the poſt of Lembech, which was garriſoned by the Pruſſian troops, retook the heights of Kraehenberg, and drove the French back near Haguenau

'On the eighteenth, an attack of the Imperial troops were determined upon, but not executed, becauſe on account of the badneſs of the roads, it was found impoſſible to convey the artillery to the point of attack. In the firm perſuaſion that general Hotze would maintain caute-qui'l-caute, Liebfrauberg, on account of its great importance, his highneſs ſent captain de Kampz, of his etat-major, to general Wurmſer with a written meſſage, 'reiterating the advice to quit the poſition at Haguenau; to ſupport his right wing by Leibfrauberg, and his left by the Rhine: to attack the enemy if it was poſſible, in any way to do ſo on the twenty-third of December; to drive them from Werdt, of which they had taken poſſeſſion; and his highneſs added, that he had every diſpoſition to aſſiſt him in his whole force in the execution of this plan.'

'The Auſtrian general approved this plan. But, contrary to all expectation, and without any ſufficient reaſon, general Hotze abandoned the height of Liebenfrau, which obliged the whole of the Pruſſian corps, poſted at Lembech, to retreat towards Weiler. In the night between the twenty-ſecond and twenty-third, the Imperial army paſſed the Saar, repulſed the enemy, who endeavoured to turn their flank, with great loſs, and on the twenty-fourth took poſt on the Goiſberg and the heights of Weiſſembourg. On this and the following day, the French made different attacks on Taubenheim, defended by the Pruſſians, but were repulſed, and many priſoners taken from them.

'On the morning of the twenty-fifth of December, almoſt all the Auſtrian officers reſolved to abandon the ſtrong poſition of Weiſſembourg, to repaſs the Rhine with the army, and conſequently to raiſe the blockade of Landau. General Funck was ſent to the duke to intimate to him this reſolution. His highneſs then publicly and ſolemnly declared —'that in the preſent circumſtances, they muſt not think of a retreat, but only of an attack on the enemy, in order to bring them to battle. That he found himſelf reduced to the neceſſity of declaring in the face of all Europe, that he would not give his conſent to a meaſure that muſt for ever diſhonor the two armies in the eyes of the univerſe. That it would be inexcuſable to retire thus, without trying any thing againſt the enemy, inasmuch as the moſt diſaſtrous reſult of a loſt battle could not be more calamitous, than would be the effects of ſuch a retreat. The hereditary prince of Hohenlohe was ſent to Weiſſembourg with this formal declaration of the duke; and in conſequence of this the Auſtrians agreed to hazard the fate of a battle, and of theſe important facts, the duke's aid-de-camp, major de Kleiſt, and captain Kampz, were witneſſes.

'The duke went himſelf alſo to general Wurmſer, and prevailed on him to attack the French on the twenty-ſixth. On the twenty-fifth, a general reconnoitring took place, when prince Hohenlohe, with fifteen ſquadrons of Pruſſian cavalry and ſome horſe artillery, defeated a conſiderable number of the enemy's horſe, and took many priſoners. The enemy were repulſed every where, and the poſt of Seebach maintained. Unfortunately the attack, concerted for the twenty-ſixth, was not made, and the troops deſtined for this attack, were ordered to fall back. The gallant colonel Goetz, who was mortally wounded in chaſing the French from the height near Taubenheim, was replaced at this important poſt by the prince of Brunſwick. Some Auſtrian battalions had, in the mean time, by the enemy's great ſuperiority in number, been forced back near Weiſſembourg; a thick fog at firſt prevented the prince from ſeeing this circumſtance; but it being perceived in a little time that the fire advanced more and more towards Weiſſembourg, the-duke galloped at full ſpeed to that place, and found on his arrival the left wing of the Auſtrian troops in complete route. The muſqueteers of the enemy already occupied the height by which alone the communication with Weiſſembourg could be maintained, and the French cavalry were on the point of placing themſelves between this city and the Auſtrian army, which would have made their retreat impoſſible. In this deciſive inſtant, the duke, ſword in hand, rallied ſome Auſtrian battalions, and led them right on to the enemy, whom he drove from the heights; and after this valorous action, he found the right wing of the Auſtrians re-eſtabliſhed in perfect order, and by this means ſaved them from total flight. He was bravely ſeconded in this by the Auſtrian general Wartenſleben.

'The enemy now confined themſelves to a briſk cannonade, but the imperial army retreated behind the Lauret, towards Guermerſheim, and paſſed afterwards the Rhine on the thirtieth, near Philipſburg, notwithſtanding the duke's ſtrong remonſtrations of the ſtrength of the poſt of Guermerſheim, and the poſſibility of maintaining it without any great difficulty, which would have preſerved the communication of the Pruſſians with the Rhine, and prevented the loſs of the conſiderable magazines eſtabliſhed in that quarter. The retreat of the Imperialiſts obliged the duke's army alſo to fall back, which was done with the greateſt order, He took a poſt between Oppenheim, Obernheim, and Alzey, in the centre of which poſition lies Mentz. Colonel Szekuly was detached to Kreutznach to ſecure Coblentz, and lieutenant general Lindt ordered to occupy Bingen. The enemy made on the thirtieth an attempt to attack the rear of the Pruſſian army, but major-general Ruchel repulſed them with a conſiderable loſs.'

The above paper had alſo been circulated at Vienna, and there it was called, 'the correſpondence between count Wurmſer and the duke of Brunſwick, previous to the repaſſing of the Rhine.' This copy has the following additional paſſage: 'count Wurmſer thanks the duke for his aſſiſtance at Geiſberg, without which his army might have been deſtroyed; he bewails the ſituation of his army, of which the duke was an eye-witneſs, and requeſts his advice what to do?' The duke, on his part, 'ſincerely wiſhes he could do more, and tells him that it is his advice to him to paſs the Rhine, but not haſtily, that he might not ſpread too much terror throughout the German empire; that he might have time to ſave the magazines, and give the inhabitants an opportunity of eſcaping with their moſt valuable effects; that he (the duke) ſhould go towards Mentz to protect that important fortreſs, and the paſſage over the Rhine in that neighbourhood.' In a very little time after the Auſtrians had croſſed the Rhine, the court of Vienna removed general Wurmſer from the command. And before the end of January 1794, the duke of Brunſwick reſigned his command of the Pruſſian army, in which he was ſucceeded by general Mollendorff. The prince of Waldeck ſucceeded general Wurmſer.

Towards the end of January the following letter was publiſhed at Baſle in Switzerland, written by a perſon who alſo ſtyles himſelf an occular witneſs of the events he relates.

'Previous to the famous affair of Gerſheim, the utmoſt diſcontent prevailed among the armies.—The Auſtrians accuſed the Pruſſians of hanging back, and leaving them foremoſt to the fire of the enemy; the Pruſſians retorted the charge. The Saxons quarrelled with the Bavarians, and the Heſſians accuſed the Palatines of cowardice. In this ſtate of things, the French continually haraſſing them, and a dearth of liquor taking place (a gill of ſpirits ſold for twenty-two ſols) the Auſtrians were benumbed with cold, and ſaw the French ſoldier enjoying his bottle, with every comfort that the ſeaſon required. A general diſcouragement and numberleſs deſertions were the conſequence. At length the French ſtormed the batteries at Gerſheim, the moſt formidable that have been ever known; three tiers of artillery, the guns placed en cremailliere, ſo as to produce a triple line of croſſed fire, and the whole well manned. But what cannot bravery do? the line broke—the French fell upon the combined troops with the bayonet.

'To the firſt and ſecond courier, General Wurmſer refuſed belief; upon the third, and a band of huſſars flying, without knowing where, a council was called, and the retreat was ordered — but it was too late; the French were marching all the while, with their bayonets in the flank of the Auſtrians. In diſpair they threw away their arms, and fled, without knowing the road: their officers abandoned their corps to ſave their baggage, for the Emperor never indemnifies that loſs—with difficulty could they ſave themſelves. For ſix hours, the French never ceaſed killing with the bayonet, without firing a ſhot; fatigue obliged them to halt;—the deſerters arrived in hundreds.

'The inhabitants of Alſace who had declared for the Auſtrians, requeſted two days notice from general Wurmſer, in caſe of evacuation; he promiſed, and anſwered for their ſafety upon his head; thirty thouſand at leaſt were forced at this juncture to abandon all their property, and to ſave themſelves as well as they could.

'At the lines of Weiſſembourg the generals endeavoured to rally their troops, but the panic was too great, they never halted till near Germerſheim; a body of Pruſſians were here attempted to be ſtopped by the combined forces, but they made their road through them with their ſabres. The French, ſtill purſuing, arrived at the lines of Weiſſembourg, where in addition to the immenſe capture of baggage, they found all the artillery they had loſt at this place, with an enormous magazine of powder deſtined for the ſiege of Landau; a part of the allies reſerve artillery was alſo abandoned at Lauterbourg. The Auſtrians had the barbarity to place a lighted fuze to blow up the magazine, though they had left near fifteen hundred of their wounded in the town, and near one thouſand priſoners; the French arrived time enough to prevent the exploſion. The Auſtrians croſſed the Rhine at Manheim, and the Pruſſians retreated to Worms.'

On the ſixth of January the duke of Brunſwick addreſſed a letter to the king of Pruſſia entreating his recal, this document is not leſs important than the former, as it exhibits at once his perſonal motives and the formidable character in which the republicans now appeared to the moſt experienced general then in Europe. 'The unhappy experience,' ſays he, 'that want of connexion, diſtruſt, egotiſm, and a ſpirit of cabal, had diſconcerted the meaſures adopted during the two laſt campaigns, and ſtill continues to diſconcert the plans of the combined armies: oppreſſed by the misfortune of being involved in the error of others, in the unfortunate ſituation in which I find myſelf, I feel very ſenſibly that the world jud ges of military characters by their ſucceſſes, without examining cauſes. Raiſing the ſiege of Landau will make an epoch in the hiſtory of this unfortunate war, and I have the misfortune to be implicated in it. The reproach will fall upon me, and the innocent will be implicated with the guilty.'

He proceeds to urge that the objects of one campaign were loſt, and that there appeared no hope that a third would offer a more favourable iſſue. The ſame reaſons he aſſerts, ſtill divided the powers which had hitherto divided them. 'When a great nation like that of France is conducted by the terror of punishments, and by enthusiasm; an unanimous sentiment, and the same principle ought to prevail in the measures of the coalesced powers. But when instead thereof, each army acts separately and alone of its own accord, without any fixed plans, without unanimity, and without principles, the consequences are such as we have seen at Dunkirk, at Maubege, at Toulon, and at Landau! Heaven preserve your majesty from great misfortunes! but every thing is to be feared, if confidence, harmony, uniformity of sentiments, of principles, and of action, do not take place of the opposite sentiments which have been the sources of all misfortunes for two years past."

With this representation the actual state of the opposed armies correctly corresponded. At Paris in the midst of distraction a few men of transcendant talents combined the immense plans of operation, provided troops, stores, and every supply for their armies, and discovered generals capable not only of carring their plans into effect but of profiting by events that could not be foreseen, and converting them to the facilitation of the general project. On the other side every power had its plan, and as they were founded more on their particular aggrandizement, than the subjugation of the republicans, the latter had beside their pre-eminent ardour and intrepidity, the advantage of operations combining all against one point only at a time.

The state of the opposite armies at the opening of this campaign have been variously stated, the French however have been allowed to maintain in the field 780,000 men; while the allies have been represented as having little more than one half of that number; the following distribution of both armies, however, is taken from the medium of several accounts:—

French Armies.		Allied Armies.
Of the North, - -	220,000	Cobourg's, - - - -	160,000
Rhine and Moselle, -	280,000	Duke of York, - -	30,000
Alps, - - - - - -	60,000	Dutch, - - - - -	25,000
Eastern Pyrennees, -	80,000	Austrians on the Rhine,	64,000
Of the South, - -	60,000	Prussian, - - - -	64,000
Of the West, - - -	80,000	Of the Empire, - -	40,000
		Emigrants. - - -	22,000
	780,000		405,000

The French troops it is to be observed, were composed of men brought into the field without so much as having recourse to more than the first requisition; and three of those armies, amounting to 200,000 men, were in fact neutral with regard to the allies in the north and on the Rhine; and that of the west, was no more than an army of observation. On the side of the allies also, was to be counted the forces of Spain, Portugal, Sardinia, and Naples, which were opposed or kept in check by two of those armies; beside the emperor had been making preparations with great vigour for a diversion on that side, and four regiments of Hungarians of Esterhazy and Nedasty, were ordered to Oneglia to embark for Savoy. So that in point of numbers in the field the disparity was trivial if not on the side of the allies.

The exhauſted ſtate of the reſources of Auſtria however was greatly felt at this period; and extraordinary meaſures were neceſſary in order to ſupport the campaign. The members of the Germanic body appear to have been as much divided as the leading parties of the coalition, and they appeared to be impreſſed with the common ſentiment of Europe at the time, that the idea of conquering France was at beſt but a chimera.

In the month of January, the Auſtrian envoy at the diet of Ratiſbon delivered a note on the part of the emperor, to demand the ſenſe of the Germanic ſtates, reſpecting the neceſſity of arming the inhabitants of the frontiers, and furniſhing a triple contingent on behalf of the ſeveral ſtates. This note, as cuſtomary with the allies, was animated with invective and virulence in proportion to its defeats and diſappointments. The revolution was reviled, and atheiſm reproached, the decrees of France for raiſing the people in a maſs were impugned as violent and tyrannical, and yet a like meaſure was ſuggeſted; and it was intimated that coercive means ſhould be adopted by the diet againſt ſuch members as had not fulfilled the decree of the twenty-third of November, 1792, for the effectual furniſhing of the contingents agreeably to the mode regulated in 1681.

With all this immenſe preparation, it was later than uſual before any movement took place. This was publicly attributed to the reluctance of the Pruſſian court to engage further in the conteſt. It is not improbable that the cabinet of Berlin which has ever regulated itſelf by a policy for its own aggrandizement, might be ſtrongly influenced by the repreſentations of the duke of Brunſwick; the prize of Poland which had been thrown by the adverſe circumſtances of France into the hands of Pruſſia, perhaps ſatisfied the king, and as he had evidently entered into the conteſt with no other view than to ſhare in the propoſed partition of France, when that object appeared no longer attainable, it appears no longer ſurpriſing that he ſhould wiſh to ſecure what he had gained, by a ſeceſſion from the grand alliance, the time was not however arrived to throw off the maſk. He thought it neceſſary therefore openly to contradict the ſuſpicions which had been inſinuated againſt him; and in his name a declaration was delivered to the ſtates of the Germanic circles aſſembled at Frankfort.

The tenor of this declaration was, that he heard with high diſpleaſure deſigns imputed to him of an intention to ſecularize biſhopries and chapters, of appropriating to himſelf certain cities of the empire, in order to indemnify him for the immenſe expences which he had been at for two years in defending the German empire. That with the well-diſpoſed this would not be believed, but he had given orders to baron Hochſtetter to declare, that while he made war upon the French, he had never any views but the defence of the Germanic empire and the maintenance of its conſtitution; that it never was his majeſty's deſign to make conqueſts for himſelf only, and if conqueſts were made from France, the empire would have its ſhare; that he never meant to deviate from ſuch intentions, but he expected above all that the ſix circles moſt expoſed to danger, would co-operate as much as the conſtitution and patriotiſm required of them.

Explicit as this declaration was, ſo far as the intention of the allies concerned France, the diſpoſition of the monarch was ſtill a ſubject of doubt under the circumſtances of the war. The plan of arming the people in a maſs gave the Pruſſian monarch a very ſenſible alarm; thoſe who were ſuſpicious of his earneſtneſs to purſue the war, conceived the oppoſition made by his envoy at the diet, to this meaſure, as an unequivocal indication of his intention to ſecede, as he intimated that he ſhould withdraw his troops were ſuch a meaſure attempted. The reaſonings of the Pruſſian monarch, however, on this point not only diſplay a deep ſagacity, but are very ſtriking in themſelves, and abſolutely unanſwerable. The principal effect of his oppoſition was, a conviction on the minds of the allies, and an explicit aſſurance to France, that Pruſſia deſpaired of the conteſt, The king obſerves :— 1. That by employing the huſbandmen and yeomanry againſt the enemy, agriculture will want hands. 2. That it is difficult to arm ſuch a maſs of people. 3. That it is impoſſible in a reaſonable time to teach them diſcipline. 4. That it requires troops well diſciplined to oppoſe the French. 5. That it is infinitely dangerous, at a time when the French are eagerly graſping at every opportunity to inſinuate their principles, to bring together a body of men in arms, whoſe ideas upon government muſt be various, and among whom diſcuſſions may ariſe, diſaſtrous in their conſequences.

Theſe fears which were thus ſo pointedly expreſſed, were exactly what all the coaleſced powers affected to feel; the feudal and Gothic eſtabliſhments which ſubſiſt only upon the ignorance which they have ſo much operated to continue, would be entirely endangered could the bulk of the European people obtain ſuch a mode of intercourſe as would propagate opinions among the illiterate, which are underſtood and diſcuſſed by the learned alone under deſpotic governments.

In the month of February, however, ſome tranſactions of a ſingular nature took place at Frankfort. A negociation profeſſedly for an exchange of priſoners was opened between the king of Pruſſia and the republic at that city. The French commiſſioners entered Frankfort with a degree of ſplendor very unuſual in matters of an ordinary nature; they appeared in one of the ſtate carriages of the late king, decorated with the cap of liberty and other republican emblems; they diſplayed the national cockade, and their whole ſuite was diſtinguiſhed for its elegance and the number of perſons that compoſed it. The Pruſſian general Kalkreuth, well known to poſſeſs the fulleſt confidence of the king, was the perſon appointed to tranſact the buſineſs of the negociation, which was conducted under the moſt profound ſecrecy, contrary to the ordinary practice on negociations concerning priſoners. Whatever may have been the nature of theſe tranſactions, it is certain that a good underſtanding thenceforward prevailed between the two powers; and it has been aſſerted with much plauſibility, that the baſis of the treaty between France and Pruſſia, which tranſpired in 1795, was laid at Frankfort on this occaſion.

What appears moſt extraordinary on the ſubject of this notorious tranſaction is, that the powers coaleſced do not ſeem to have felt any conſiderable alarm on the occaſion, but that they continued to repoſe confidence in the co-operation of Pruſſia. This crafty monarch had in the early part of the year attempted through the elector of Mentz to obtain a ſum from certain of the Germanic ſtates for the proviſioning of his army; the effort was not ſucceſsful; but he had ſet his mind on obtaining a reimburſement of his expences, and knowing no power ſo eager for the proſecution of the war, nor ſo capable of paying his military ſervices as England, he appears to have ſet his mind upon that object. The appointment of mareſchal Mollendorf to the command of his troops has been noticed before, the king now notified to the prince of Cobourg that he had directed that officer and general Kalkreuth to withdraw with their armies from the environs of Mentz, and march to Cologn; and on the thirteenth of March he addreſſed the Germanic body, in a public paper, announcing his receſſion from the confederacy. This remarkable document ſtated, that " the war was not a war with a civilized nation, and with diſciplined armies, but a conteſt with a delirious and never diminiſhing ſwarm of men—with a highly populous nation, provided with every reſource for war—a ſet of men who did not fight merely for victory, but who fought by fire, ſword, and the poiſon of their pernicious doctrines, to ſubvert the whole reverend and ſocial edifice of Germany." He ſtates the efforts he had made to oppoſe "this almoſt unconquerable enemy;" that he had made every poſſible ſacrifice to the common cauſe which the natural ſtrength of Pruſſia would admit, and had not heſitated to expoſe "his moſt ſacred perſon." For this object alone, he continues, ſo much Pruſſian blood has been ſpilt—for this ſo much treaſure has been drained from his dominions; and he concludes this part of his declaration, that he is able "no longer to take an active part from his own means, without utterly ruining his own dominions, and entirely exhauſting the property of his ſubjects."

He then ſtates the means which he had employed to obtain from the circles of the empire the neceſſary ſupport; he cenſures in unqualified terms the inſane propoſal of arming the peaſants—"a meaſure obviouſly inefficient againſt an enemy who preſſes forward with irreſiſtible fury, ſkilled in tactics, and with a numerous artillery,"—"a meaſure dangerous, becauſe when the peaſant is armed and brought away from his ordinary mode of life, the enemy may become his moſt dangerous ſeducer." He declares therefore his reſolution to withdraw his troops from the protection of the empire.

This declaration was no ſooner known in England than it began to operate as was intended. How far Auſtria connived at this manœuvre, or whether the emperor was himſelf duped in this tranſaction has not been declared; certain it is that colonel Mack was ſent expreſs to England to encreaſe the alarms of the miniſters there, and that he actually carried on the negociation for a ſubſidy to Pruſſia.

On the nineteenth of April a treaty was ſigned at the Hague by lord Malmſbury, by which Great Britain and the ſtates general agreed to take into pay 62,400 Pruſſians, to be commanded by a Pruſſian officer, for which a ſubſidy of fifty thouſand pounds ſterling per month was to be paid, beſides the ſum of three hundred thouſand pounds to be paid immediately to defray the charge of completing the army, and one hundred thouſand pounds to pay their expences home; beſides the ſum of one pound twelve ſhillings per man, per month, for bread and forage, amounting to an additional ſum of one hundred thouſand pounds per month, or one million two hundredthouſand pounds per annum. To the whole of this expenditure Holland was to contribute only four hundred thouſand pounds per annum.

It is difficult to determine, whether the duplicity of the Pruſſian, or the abandoned extravagance and folly of the Engliſh miniſter, was moſt conſpicuous in this tranſaction. A writer on the continent of Europe converſant in diſplomatic affairs remarks upon it—"That every article in the treaty betrayed the incapacity of the Engliſh miniſter, and the circumſtance alone, of the army being commanded by a Pruſſians was ſufficient to render it totally inefficient." Experience juſtified the remark.

To theſe various negotiations it was owing that the campaign opened ſo late. A council of war was held on the ſeventeenth of April, at Valenciennes, where the duke of York lately returned from England, and general Clairfait, attended with Cobourg. After the council adjourned, the two former returned to their camps.

Towards the end of March the republicans had appeared in Weſt Flanders, and on the twenty-ninth of that month attacked the Auſtrian outpoſts of Cateau, Beauvais, and Seleſmes; in the vicinity of Landrecy. The poſts were carried, but a large body of Auſtrian cavalry coming up, the French were obliged to retreat with loſs. About the ſame period a party of French ſurpriſed the Heſſian poſts at Tenbreuil, between Werwick and Ypres, and purſuing their advantage attacked the Hanoverian pickets and cut them off. A body of troops advanced from Menin to the ſuccour of the Hanoverians, the French deliberately paſſed the Lys, carrying with them three officers, and one hundred and thirteen other priſoners.

Inaction ſo fatal in camps had cauſed great havoc in the imperial armies, it appears that in the month of April there were 23,000 thouſand perſons in the hoſpitals of the Auſtrians, including the wounded. The natural vivacity, and mode of feſtivity that had been adopted in the republican armies, contributed to preſerve them from thoſe dyſenteries that proved fatal to the Auſtrians. Theſe, nor the common chances of war, were not ſo ruinous to the allied powers as the diviſions among their leaders. A general council of war was convened at Ath, about this period, and the arrangements for the campaign ſettled at Vienna, to which we have before alluded, were brought forward by general Hadick. According to this plan Clairfait was to command the advance of the combined army, and the duke of York to command under him. The duke of York, who appears to have been calculated to form ſuch a hero as the late duke of Cumberland his relation, that never gained a victory but over the unfortunate Highlanders, would not ſubmit to act in a ſubordinate rank. The talents and experience of Clairfait were unqueſtionably great, and that of the duke was acknowledged to be ſmall; he had already nearly deſtroyed an army by his confidence and ignorance of tactics at Dunkirk; but the ſucceſs which had attended the operations of the engineers before Valenciennes in the laſt campaign, had dazzled his vanity; for although utterly ignorant of the ſciences neceſſary to conſtitute an engineer, he had taken to himſelf that merit which belonged to other officers in the conduct of the ſiege. An altercation enſued at the council, in which the pride of the duke was hurt by the fair reaſonings of the veterans who compoſed the committee, and it was with much difficulty that the archduke Charles and lord Elgin, could prevent the conteſt from proceeding to the laſt extremities. The duke however, declared that the Britiſh troops ſhould not act until he had conſulted the cabinet of St. James. A compromiſe was at length effected, by the emperor taking upon himſelf the whole nominal command, and thus Clairfait and Mack, who had laid the plan of the campaign had the actual conduct of the operations. Such jealouſies muſt have been fruitful of diſaſter and diſtruſt, and in the end proved to be ſo.

The emperor who had conformable to the compromiſe reviewed the armies; reſolved to proceed to Bruſſels on the ninth of April, in order to go through that ſolemn pageantry, under which, for the laſt time, he was to be inaugurated as the duke of Brabant. The ſtates waited on him in a body which the keys of the gate of Louvain, the inſcription upon which was calculated to reflect a ſevere ſatire on the perſon and the occaſion—"Cæſar adest, fremunt Galli!"—Cæſar appears and the Gauls tremble!

The ſelf-infatutation of power is very conſpicious in this inſignificant ceremony—a number of children decorated with white ſcarfs drew the imperial ſtate coach, and Te deum was chaunted, and congratulatory verſes were preſented to Cæſar! Pageantry where it is not characteriſtic of truth is indeed a groſs abſurdity, for the meaneſt underſtanding can diſtinguiſh between objects which call forth wonder or demand eſteem. Bruſſels had already felt how little competent the emperor was to enſure its ſecurity, and this triumphal ſhew muſt have appeared to the thinking citizens like thoſe oriental pageants which call forth the adoration of the devout and cruſh them beneath their gorgeous wheels in order to enſure their ſanctification.

From Bruſſels the emperor proceeded to Valenciennes, and his preſence diffuſed at leaſt an apparent joy through the army. On the ſixteenth of April he renewed the troops on the heights of Cateau; and on the next day the army proceeded in eight columns to inveſt Landrecy, a ſmall but well fortified town in antient Hainault. The firſt column compoſed of Auſtrian and Dutch troops, under the prince of Heſſe Darmſtadt, advanced upon the village of Catillon, which they forced. The ſecond under general Alvinzy, forced the French entrenchments at Mazinguer, Oiſy, and Nouvion, and took poſſeſſion of the foreſt. The third column led by the emperor and prince Cobourg, after carrying the villages of Ribotville and Waſſigny, detached forward the advance guards which took poſſeſſion of the heights of Grand and Petic Blocus. The fourth and fifth colums, were under the duke of York, who commanded the firſt of them in perſon, the latter was under ſir William Erſkine, their object was the redoubts and village of Vaux, and the French intrenchments in the Bois de Bouhain, which ſervice they accompliſhed. The ſixth, ſeventh, and eighth columns under the hereditary prince of Orange were not engaged, being only a corps of obſervation on the ſide of Cambray.

On the morning of the eighteenth the prince of Orange's advance guard was attacked by a ſmall party of French, who were repulſed. The ſiege of Landrecy commenced in conſequence of theſe ſucceſſes, under the direction of the hereditary prince of Orange. General Wurmb with a detached party at Denain was vigorouſly attacked by the republicans on the nineteenth, and on the twenty-firſt an entrenched camp and redoubt at the village of Elogues was taken from the French; who on the ſame day attacked two detachments of the prince of Cobourg's advance guard at Nouvion and Blocus. At the latter place they were repulſed, but at the former they ſucceeded in forcing Alvinzy to retreat.

Meanwhile the French had aſſembled a formidable force at the camp of Cæſar, in the neighbourhood of Cambray; and on the twenty-third general Otto was ſent with a body of cavalry to reconnoitre them in that poſition; but finding them too ſtrong, he was compelled to wait till the following morning for a reinforcement, when he ſucceeded in forcing them to retreat to Cambray, with the loſs of twelve hundred men, three pieces of cannon, and their general Chapuy taken priſoner, with three hundred and fifty others officers and privates. The loſs on the part of the allies was never publiſhed.

This action may be conſidered as the opening of the campaign on the part of the French. The attack it appears extended along the whole frontier from Treves to the ſea. The diviſion under the emperor was attacked at the ſame time by three columns, and repulſed the French. At one point the French however were ſignally ſucceſsful, and there is much reaſon to believe that the actions juſt noticed were no more than feints to cover the main movement of their deſign. General Clairfait with ſome battalions of Auſtrians and Hanoverians had taken poſt at Moucron, and waited only to be joined by ſix more battalions of Auſtrian infantry to commence an attack. On the twenty-ninth, Pichegru anticipated the enemy's deſign by a vigorous aſſault on the allies at that point, and after an obſtinate conflict drove them from that poſt; while the republicans at the ſame moment inveſted and took the town of Courtray, and by that means ſo effectually deprived Menin of any hope of ſuccour, that it alſo fell into their hands. The garriſon of Menin, however, conſiſting of four battalions of Hanoverians and four companies of emigrants, determined to force their way through the conquering army, which they did, and with great loſs arrived at Ingelmunſter, harraſſed ſeverely during the fatal march.

Landrecy in ſome degree conſoled the allies for the loſs of Menin; though the former was not taken until ten days after the opening of the trenches, and a bombardment ſo ſevere that no more than three houſes were left ſtanding, and two hundred of the inhabitants and twelve hundred of the garriſon killed. The remainder when they ſurrendered conſiſted of four thouſand four hundred men.

On the ſide of Treves, Jourdan who had been ſo ſingularly ſuperceded in the command of the army of the north, was now appointed to command on the Moſelle. Early in March the committee of public ſafety had directed this army to advance towards Longwy near Arlon, in order to cut off the communication of the counties of Treves and Luxembourg with thoſe of Namur and Liege. Jourdan, who had felt the love of his country riſe ſuperior to the reſentments of party, here diſplayed once more the vigour of his mind and military capacity. The movement which it appears was originally ſuggeſted by himſelf, was executed with complete ſucceſs. On the memorable ſeventeenth of April, when the grand attack was made by the whole French line, Jourdan attacked general Beaulieu, and in an action which laſted for two ſucceſſive days, defeated him, and took the enemy's poſt at Arlon; the loſs of the Auſtrians in this action was ſaid to be very conſiderable. The French commander, however abandoned Arlon a few days after the action it being found untenable. Some advantage was gained over the Auſtrian general Melas at the ſame time near the Moſelle and Saar.

On the fourth of May the French attacked a ſmall party at Rouſſalaer, under colonel Linſinghen, but after a bloody conflict they were repulſed with the loſs of two hundred men. On the tenth the duke of York was aſſailed near Tournay by the republican forces in different columns to the amount of thirty thouſand men. The attack began at day break, when the French attempted to turn the right flank of the combined army, but were driven back by the Auſtrian regiment of Kaunitz, which was poſted in a wood to cover the enemy's flank. The French then directed their efforts againſt the duke of York's centre, upon which they advanced in the face of a heavy cannonade with great firmneſs. An occaſion ſoon offered to attack the French on their right flank, and they retreated. The loſs in this affair on either ſide has never been authenticated. The Engliſh troops and their commanders appear to have been much elated by their ſucceſs againſt the French on this occaſion, and advanced their front conſiderably beyond their former poſition in conſequence.

On the Sunday after this action general Clairfait, who had croſſed the Heule on the preceding night, was attacked by the republicans. The only account that has appeared of this affair is the Auſtrian, in which it is ſaid the French were repulſed and driven back to Courtray; but it is difficult to reconcile this account with itſelf, ſince, we find that Clairfait found it neverthleſs expedient not only to retreat precipitately and recroſs the Heule, but alſo to paſs the river Mandel, ſtill further in the rear.

This war among many ſingular phenomena, has more than once exhibited the declaredly victorious commander of the combined forces flying before the beaten and diſcomfited republicans. General Clairfait, it has been however allowed, ſuffered conſiderably in this engagement, and being cloſely purſued even after he had croſſed the Mandel, found himſelf obliged ſtill to continue his retreat to Thieldt, where he was at length enabled to take a poſition which covered Bruges, Ghent, and Oſtend.

It was nearly about this period that the French army of the North croſſed the Sambre, and, according to their own report, ſeized the town of Beriche. General Kaunitz was forced to retreat, and to take a poſition between Rouveroy and Beriche in order to cover Mons. With that impetuoſity which has diſtinguiſhed their whole military carreer, the republicans did not long permit him to continue unmoleſted in this ſituation. They attacked him on the fourteenth of May; the conflict was long and bloody, but the French were repulſed, and obliged to re-croſs the Sambre, with a loſs of between four and five thouſand men and ſome artillery.

This unexpected ſucceſs lulled the Auſtrians into a fatal confidence that they had ſecured that part of the country completely; the emperor therefore determined to march without delay to the aſſiſtance of the duke of York, who ſtill retained his poſition unmoleſted near Tournay.

Here a grand attack upon the French lines was concerted, which it was concluded would clear the whole of Flanders from the French armies. In order to render the project deciſive the army under Clairfait was likewiſe ordered to co-operate. On the ſixteenth at night, the allied army moved forward in five vaſt columns; two of which on the left were to force the paſſages of the Marque, and by a vigorous attack on the French poſts along the river to cover the operations of the three remaining columns. Theſe columns however forced the paſſages ſo late, and were ſo fatigued with their march, that they were unable to accompliſh the remainder of the propoſed plan. The column on the right under general Boſche was equally unfortunate: for finding the republicans at Moucron in much greater numbers than had been expected, he was obliged to relinquiſh his project and retire to Warcoing. General Otto was more ſucceſsful with his column; he drove the French from Waterloo, and puſhed forward to Turcoing. The column commanded by the duke of York was alſo ſucceſsful in its firſt movements; after a ſhort cannonade the French retreated from Laumoy before the duke's army in full march; the republicans halted at Roubaix, and made a ſtand; after ſome faint reſiſtance this alſo was abandoned.

The French appear to have been perfectly poſſeſſed of the enemy's deſigns in the whole of their operations, and to have taken ſuch meaſures as would lead the allies into a belief that their plans were not penetrated, at the ſame time that the moſt effectual means were taken to diſconcert the whole.

The duke of York after forcing Roubaix was purſuing his march; but as he could not learn any intelligence concerning the two columns which were to have acted on his right and left, he thought it prudent to halt. Having acquainted the emperor, with his intentions, the neceſſity of co-operating with Clairfait induced the emperor to order the Britiſh column to proceed to the attack of Mourveaux. The French entrenchments here were carried with great eaſe, the conteſt being very general but not cloſe, and thus the action of the ſeventeenth was concluded with the brighteſt aſſurances of ſucceſs to the allies.

It appears that the French purpoſely gave way on their right, and retreated in diſorder, after they had got out of reach of the enemy's guns, with a view to deceive them; and with the deſired effect, for the Engliſh troops appear to have been ſo much elated that they thought of nothing leſs than of marching to Turcoing without oppoſition, to join colonel Davay, and obſtinately retained poſſeſſion of the poſts into which they had been decoyed the next morning. The French ſucceeding to their wiſh, had during the night poured out an immenſe body of troops from Liſle with a view to turn the left flank of the Engliſh in the morning, while a large body detached from Courtray actually paſſed the Engliſh right flank, and another heavy column was poſted in the centre of their front; ſo that at noon the Engliſh were nearly ſurrounded, and were ſo much intoxicated by their previous day's ſucceſs as not to be fully aware of their danger until its peril was conſiderably encreaſed. Generals Moreau, Souham, Bonnaud, were the principal leaders on the part of the French.

Early on the morning of the eighteenth the republicans made an aſſault, on Turcoing, occupied by colonel Davay; two battalions of Auſtrians were diſpatched by the duke of York, to make a diverſion on that quarter, with expreſs orders to fall back on the main army if hard preſſed; but by ſome miſtake the battalions joined the troops at Turcoing. This circumſtance left an opening in the right wing of the duke of York's diviſion, of which the French general immediately took advantage.

At this moment the French counter-project began to unfold itſelf; a column of 15,000 men appeared advancing from Liſle, while another at the ſame time attacked general Otto's poſition near Waterloo with the moſt effectual vigour, and drove the allies before them upon the rear of the Britiſh, which they alſo attacked without heſitation, and carried diſmay and conſternation among the whole of the Britiſh column. In this ſituation the Britiſh found themſelves compelled to inſure even a retreat by fighting their way through the French. And this they accompliſhed with great valour, but with a melancholy loſs both of officers and men. The Hanoverians were the firſt to fly, and their cavalry not only deſtroyed the Engliſh infantry, but threw the whole army into ſuch diſorder that they became a helpleſs prey to the well concerted plan of the French. They fled in all directions, the duke endeavoured to rally them without the laſt effect, and he found himſelf compelled to fly with the utmoſt precipitation, accompanied by a few of the ſixteenth regiment of Iriſh dragoons, and made his way after many dangers and eſcapes to general Otto's corps, with whom, from the diſaſtrous and diſperſed ſtate of his own diviſion he was obliged to remain. After this ſeparation of the commander from his column, the very delicate and difficult taſk of collecting and extricating the Engliſh forces devolved on general Fox (brother to the celebrated ſtateſman) and the ſervice was performed by him and general Abercrombie with great firmneſs and addreſs.

The diſcomfited general on this occaſion accuſed the allies of a want of vigour and ſpirit, and attributed to them his defeat. The Auſtrian accounts on the other hand confer the blame on the bad conduct of the column itſelf, but principally the Hanoverians who compoſed part of it.

No authentic return of the loſs of the allies has been made on this occaſion, the whole has been computed at three thouſand men, but it certainly muſt have been very ſevere, ſince the Britiſh alone were acknowleged to have loſt more than one thouſand men and forty-two field-pieces. Two columns of the imperial troops, which were brought up by the emperor and Cobourg, were alſo included in the defeat. The army of Clairfait eſcaped the common deſtruction by being ſeparated from the main army by the river Lys, where he could only act as a ſpectator of the defeat.

This conflict decided in effect the fate of the Netherlands. Terror and diſmay ſpread over the country. The allies, however, collected their ſcattered forces with as much diligence as poſſible, and took poſitions in their rear at Marquain, Templeuve, and Leers, which they had before occupied, while the emperor endeavoured to cheer the drooping ſpirits of his troops by proclamations.

The allies, however, were more conſoled by the affair of the twenty-ſecond. When the republicans renewed the attack, with a force of one hundred thouſand men, directed againſt the right wing of the combined army, with the intention of forcing the paſſage of the Scheldt, and inveſting Tournay They ſucceeded in forcing the out-poſts, but receiving a reinforcement under general Fox, that officer by an operation of great ſkill and intrepidity, reſiſted the impetuoſity of the republicans, and maintained the poſition. The conflict, however, was ſevere, and continued from five in the morning till ten at night. The French finding it impoſſible to accompliſh their object withdrew unmoleſted to Liſle. The allies reported that the loſs of the French on this occaſion was twelve thouſand men, but as it was allowed that the Britiſh loſt only one hundred, and no return was made of he loſs of the Auſtrians, no reliance is to be placed on that computation. The loſs muſt have been conſiderable on both ſides. Pichegru commanded the French on this occaſion, and his arrangements are ſaid to have been made with ſo much judgment, that although he failed in his deſign, his wings and rear were ſo well covered by a wood that they could neither be aſſailed nor turned by cavalry.

About the ſame period in which theſe deſparate conflicts took place, another partial ſucceſs occurred in favour of the allies. General Beaulieu made an incurſion into the duchy of Bouillon, defeated a body of the French ſtationed in that canton, took the town by ſtorm, and delivered it up to pillage. Above twelve hundred Frenchmen were maſſacred in cold blood on this occaſion, and only three hundred left, who had ſecreted themſelves during the maſſacre, and afterwards ſurrendered priſoners. Six pieces of cannon were alſo taken by the allies. The pretence for this barbarity was, that ſome people of the town had taken arms and fired on the Auſtrians.

On the twenty-fourth general Kaunitz alſo gained a victory over the French who had again croſſed the Sambre and taken a poſition with their left to Rouveroy and their right to Fontain l'Eveque. The allies advanced upon the French by ſurpriſe, and they were compelled to abandon fifty pieces of cannon; their loſs was computed at between two and three thouſand priſoners; of the Auſtrian loſs there was no return made. Mareſchal Mollendorff commanding the Pruſſians, on the ſame day ſurpriſed the French entrenchments at Keiſerſlautern, and defeated them with conſiderable loſs.

This gleam of ſucceſs on the part of the combined powers was again of ſhort duration; for while general Beaulieu was making his barbarous incurſion into Bouillon, Luxembourg was penetrated by general Jourdan at the head of forty thouſand men, who immediately took poſſeſſion of the important poſition of Arlon. Beaulieu was therefore obliged to abandon the ſcene of his maſſacres, and to retire with the utmoſt haſte to Marche, in order to cover Namur.

No time was loſt in making uſe of this firſt judicious movement by Jourdan; the communication between Charleroi and Bruſſels, was now completely cut off, and the former place was immediately inveſted. On the third of June however they were attacked by the prince of Orange, who compelled them to raiſe the ſiege and re-croſs the Sambre with loſs. But this momentary ſucceſs was not attended with any durable advantage, for in the courſe of a few days the French croſſed the river again with ſixty thouſand men and commenced the ſiege; on the 14th general Devaux with ten companies of grenadiers deſtroyed a redoubt erected by the beſieged and on which they had placed great dependance.

On the eleventh of June general Moreau with three diviſions of the right wing of the army of the Moſelle, moved from their poſition, and took poſt at Permaſens, Blieſcaſtel, and Hornbeck, the enemy flying at their approach.

On the ſixteenth (28 Prairial) the army of the north was joined by a diviſion from the Moſelle, and marched to meet the enemy, who were at the ſame moment marching to attack them; a thick miſt prevailed all the morning, and it was not until they had approached very cloſe that they each diſcovered the other; the battle commenced with terrible fury. Generals Kleber, Duhem, Dubois, and Lefebre diſtinguiſhed themſelves in this gallant conflict; and the celebrated engineer general Mareſcot was engaged in this action; he took charge of the works againſt Charleroi immediately after. In this action the allies loſt ſix thouſand men. During the conflict the French loſt ſeveral pieces of cannon in the miſt, but they regained them, and ſeven pieces of the enemy's were taken by the French cavalry.

The danger to which Charleroi was now expoſed, as well as Bruſſels itſelf, determined the prince of Cobourg to make one grand effort for its relief. In compliance therefore with the ſolicitations of the prince of Orange and general Beaulieu, he marched with the greateſt part of the combined army, leaving behind at Tournay the duke of York with the Britiſh and Hanoverians only. On the twenty-firſt he reached Ath; on the twenty-fourth he effected a junction with the two generals to whoſe ſuccour he came.

Charleroi however capitulated in the following form on the twenty-fifth—"To citizen "Hatry commanding the French army before Charleroi, We ſubmit every thing to the "French generoſity; hoping that a garriſon, which has by its conduct merited the eſteem "of French ſoldiers, will have ſuch a lot as honor demands. (Signed) Regnac, major "general commanding the fortreſs. Dated Charleroi, June 25th, 1794". A capitulalation more honorable to a beſieging enemy is perhaps not to be found in modern hiſtory; and it forms a ſingular contraſt with the barbarity of the Auſtrian general Beaulieu ſo recently at Bouillon. The French ſoon after levelled the fortifications of Charleroi, ſo that it no longer ranks among the fortified places.

The Auſtrian general remained ignorant of the fall of Charleroi; and on the ſame evening had aſſembled his troops in great force at Nivelle, having withdrawn the corps ſtationed at Cateau, and in the environs of Cambray. Jourdan addreſſed a letter to the Committee of Public Safety the ſame evening announcing the ſurrender of Charleroi, and intimating the diſpoſitions making by the enemy, and concludes thus—"I truſt I ſhall be "fortunate enough to announce to you to-morrow, a victory that will be deciſive of the "fate of the low countries." His diligence was equal to his foreſight.

On the other ſide the army under Cobourg was reinforced by twenty thouſand Pruſſians, at the camp near Nivelle. Jourdan had poſted the main body of his army with the happieſt addreſs to cover the ſiege, ſo as to deceive the enemy concerning the actual number of his troops, which occupied Goſelies, Templeuve, and the plains of Fleurus; where he waited impatiently for the attack.

The allies had combined all their force from Valenciennes, Quesnoy, and Landrecy, to the amount of 100,000 men; artillery, had been collected from all parts, and their cavalry was double in number to that of the French. Their disposition into five columns was made with great judgment, for the situation of the ground and the nature of their proposed attack; their design was to advance along the Sambre, to surround the French by turning their flank, securing Marchiennes and Chatet. The prince of Orange commanded their right, and Beaulieu, their left; the emigrant prince of Lambesc led the cavalry, and Cobourg commanded in chief.

Jourdan had learned the disposition but could not ascertain their number; however on the evening of the twenty-fifth he made such arrangements as were necessary for the approaching day, and issued general orders prefaced with the significant parole for the morning—"No retreat to-day!" Lefebre commanded the advance of ten thousand men, Dubois led the cavalry; and the generals Kleber, Jardin, and Marceau commanded the different divisions.

On the morning of the twenty-sixth of June at three o'clock the battle commenced by an attack on the French entrenchments between Lambusart, Espines, and Goselies, and was followed by an assault on the whole line. Lefebre had to sustain the assault of an entire column of the enemy, which he did for five hours at Herpigny, beside the charge of a body of cavalry. They were received on the point of the bayonet with the utmost coolness, and thrown into the greatest confusion; at that moment Dubois charged with the French cavalry, and the route of the enemy was complete. Lefebre entered Herpigny, which had been possessed by the enemy on the onset; and Kleber pursued this success, driving the enemy before him from the bridge of Marchiennes. Meantime Marceau on the right was attacked by the whole left wing of the enemy under Beaulieu and Cobourg in person; who attempted to force the French with the bayonet; the conflict here was most terrible, Marceau had two horses killed under him.

For nine hours victory remained suspended; through the whole French line the animating parole—"No retreat to-day!" was constantly reiterated. A division of the enemy appeared in red uniform, and the decree of the convention was called to mind, they were attacked with fury and not a man escaped. "Vive la Republique!" resounded along the whole line, and indicated that the enemy were giving way. At six o'clock in the evening Jourdan having ordered to be brought up the corps de reserve, and a new train of artillery, the order was made for an uniform charge along the line. The charge was made with terrible impetuosity, and the enemy abandoned their arms and artillery, and fled on all quarters.

The action was perhaps one of the most desparate that history has recorded, having lasted from day break till night had closed; the valor of the allies, must be allowed to have been signal, as the ground upon which they fought was a gentle declevity, entrenched with a line of admirably disposed redoubts commanding the whole front of the French line. The victory, however, was so decisive that the enemy never ceased from their flight, until they had reached Halle, thirty miles from the field of battle. The French took thirty eight standards, and the loss of men was variously stated at from ten to fifteen thousand. A corps of Austrians deserted to the French after the action. The French general pursued the advantage of this brilliant victory, pushed on towards Brussels, forced Cobourg to fly from Halle, and leave Brussels, so recently the scene of Cæsar's empty pageant, to the discretion of the trembling Gauls.

The art of æroſtation was employed by Jourdan at the ſiege of Charleroi; he had obtained a corps of artiſts for this purpoſe from Paris, and conſtructed two balloons of taffeta, twenty-nine feet in length, nineteen in diameter, and fifty-ſeven in circumference; theſe were attached by cords, which being held below enabled them to be elevated or depreſſed as occaſion might require; in the car attached to the balloon was ſeated a ſkilful engineer, who held one of the cords that were attached below, and on this cord were fixed a number of braſs rings; the engineer by means of his elevation and good glaſſes was able to diſcern not only the interior ſtate of the fortreſſes but the movements of armies; and Jourdan employed them with thegreateſt a dvantage in this memorable battle; before the advance under Lefebre was charged by the whole column of Auſtrian cavalry, a note ſent down with great rapidity, being tied to a ring and a ſmall bullet attached to it, informed the general of the movement of the enemy, when about to be effected, and afforded him time to order Dubois to charge with all the French cavalry on the flank of the Auſtrians. The effect was anſwerable to the deſign.

Ypres, the key of Weſt Flanders, had been in the mean time inveſted by a French army of thirty thouſand men, with a covering army of twenty four thouſand; the great importance of this place rendered it neceſſary to encounter great riſques to maintain it, and Clairfait determined to riſque the whole army under his command rather than ſuffer it to fall. On the thirteenth of June he attacked the republicans, and drove them from their firſt poſition; but preſently he experienced a melancholy reverſe. In the courſe of five days this experienced and brave officer was three times defeated; and at length obliged to retreat, without being able to raiſe the ſiege, in the utmoſt confuſion to Ghent, where he had the additional mortification to find that the French had been prepared for his defeat and retreat, and completely cut off the communication with Oudenard.

Ypres ſurrendered to general Moreau, on the ſeventeenth of June after a gallant defence, and that general in conſideration of the bravery with which the place was defended allowed the garriſon honorable terms.

The defeat of Clairfait was fatal to the allies. General Walmoden found himſelf no longer able to maintain his poſition at Bruges; and the magiſtrates of that place on the twenty fourth opened their gates to the victors, and ſigned a formal ſubmiſſion to the armies and ſovereignty of the republic.

The Hanoverian general had effected his retreat, and joined the right wing of Clairfait's army. The duke of York's poſition at Tournay had been always hazardous, and the miſunderſtanding between that pragmatical prince and Cobourg has been ſaid to have cauſed his being left behind; on the twenty-fourth finding it no longer ſafe to remain there, he marched to Renaix, in order to ſupport Oudenarde, already inveſted, leaving only a ſmall garriſon for the defence of Tournay.

Previous to theſe events the emperor and colonel Mack, the projector of the plan of this campaign, left the army in utter deſpair of ſucceſs. The force of the allies, which in the beginning of the campaign had amounted to one hundred and eighty ſeven thouſand men was now reduced to leſs than one half that number. In vain the emperor called on the inhabitants of Belgium to riſe in a maſs, his repeated proclamations were anſwered by ſpecious but deluſive profeſſions, dictated either by a few of his actual partiſians or by prudential perſons in ſeveral cities who knowing the decided attachment which the people every where expreſſed for the French, wiſhed to ſteer between the chances of war.

* Diſcomfiture ſo general and ſignal, was not calculated to cure that jealouſy which had ſubſiſted at the opening of the campaign, accordingly the allied powers, though they did not openly accuſe each other, were privately active to throw the blame on the powers of whom they were diſtruſtful—But it is not the leaſt remarkable of thoſe private tranſactions, that Pruſſia, whoſe conduct ſpoke ſo unequivocally, eſcaped from cenſure, while the two principal powers in the war, the Engliſh and Auſtrians mutually villified each other. Letters written for the expreſs purpoſe of publication, were ſent from the Engliſh camp, accuſing the emperor of having from the beginning of the campaign withheld a number of troops neceſſary to complete the army which he had ſtipulated by treaty to bring in to the field, that the number at the cloſe of the campaign was ſixty thouſand ſhort of the number; a letter from the Engliſh camp, intended likewiſe for the public eye, dated the 23d of June, ſtated that "three weeks before, the emperor had began to remove his military ſtores from Bruſſels, into Germany. That finding the duke of York prudently refuſe to garriſon Tournay, which moſt likely would have been attended with the capture of the army, on their marching for Charleroi the Auſtrians had broken down all the bridges over the Scheldt which left no mode of retreat over that river but through Tournay, which would endanger the army. That the army being without pontoons they found it difficult to make temporary bridges; and to add to the difficulty, the navigation of the Scheldt was completely blocked up by barges ſunk by the French ſome time before, which the Auſtrians took good care ſhould not be cleared away; ſo that great part of the military ſtores lying in barges, could not be carried off for want of waggons, but muſt be either ſent up to Conde or Valenciennes, or committed to the charge of the Auſtrians."

The recriminations on the Auſtrian ſide were not ſo violent. They aſſerted a diſpoſition in the Britiſh army (this was underſtood to mean only the duke of York) to thwart the plans of the Imperial generals. That the raſhneſs and confidence of the Britiſh column had been the cauſe of that diſaſter which loſt to the allies all the previous advantages of the campaign. That the emperor had ſupplied the number of men ſtipulated, and if there was ſo great a deficiency after ſo many battles, it was to be attributed to their conſtancy in action, to the number of priſoners taken by the enemy, the numbers that had fallen, and thoſe who had been ſeduced to deſert in large bodies to the French; that the hoſpitals themſelves contained a ſmall army; and that no part of the failure was to be attributed to the Auſtrian generals whoſe ſentiments had never been divided on the plans that had been concerted, but which had been ſo unfortunately fruſtrated.

The fate of the Netherlands and of Weſt Flanders in particular was no ſooner decided, than the Engliſh cabinet determined to ſend lord Moira to Oſtend, with the remains of that army which had been raiſed to eſtabliſh royalty by invading France from the ſea; but with the ſame wiſdom that had diſtinguiſhed all their military operations, this ſuccour arrived in time to aſſiſt in the evacuation of the place which it was deſtined to defend. This body of troops amounted to ten thouſand men, and it was the latter end of June before they landed. The capture of Ypres on one ſide, and Bruges on the other, rendered lord Moira's ſituation peculiarly critical; he had ſtipulated with the miniſters, that he ſhould not take any part in the operations in the field, owing it was ſaid to his diſapproval of the conduct of the duke of York, under whom he did not chuſe to act; but the French were advancing to Ghent in great force, and little expectation was entertained that general Clairfait would be able to make any effectual reſiſtance in that quarter. By the reinforcement remaining at Oſtend, the place might perhaps have been defended for ſome time; and while the Britiſh remained maſters of the ſea the greater part of the troops might have been able to reimbark, ſhould they be cloſely purſued. On the contrary to relieve the allies, and to ſupport the Britiſh diviſion of the grand army, appeared to lord Moira a matter of ſo much neceſſity as to ſupercede all etiquette, and of more importance than to preſerve for a ſhort period the town of Oſtend; expedition and diligence were likewiſe eſſential to the object, ſince the French might in caſe of delay cut off the communitation. A council of war was held, and it was determined to evacuate Oſtend. This difficult taſk was committed to colonel Vyſe of the Engliſh guards, and on the morning of the firſt of July he commenced the embarkation, which was completed before night. The French entered the town in three columns by the weſt gate, as the laſt detachment of the Engliſh embarked, and immediately began to fire on the Engliſh tranſports, which was anſwered by the frigates and gun-boats in the road. The Engliſh veſſels amounted to a hundred and fifty ſail, and took their departure for Fluſhing on the third of July; the Glatton Indiaman laden with ordnance ſtores was run aground and ſet fire too. The wealth left in the place by the Engliſh in their flight was conſiderable, and great quantities of ſtores fell into the hands of the republicans. The inhabitants received the French with the utmoſt joy, and the republican general Vandamme immediately convoked them, and deſired that they ſhould chuſe a municipality to regulate the peace and order of the town. The port from its convenience and ſituation was as important an acquiſition as the French made during the war.

During the evacuation of Oſtend, lord Moira with the main body of his reinforcement repaired to Malle, four leagues from Bruges on the great cauſeway leading to Ghent, and ſhortly after effected a junction with Clairfait. On the fifth of July the duke of York retreated from Renaix to Gramont, and the wretched ſick and wounded were removed in open waggons to Antwerp. On the ſame day the French entered Tournay, the ſmall corps left there to garriſon the place, having fled on their approach. The republicans entered Ghent on the ſame day, which reduced the Engliſh troops to a very precarious ſituation as the French were now nearer to Antwerp by twenty miles than the duke of York. Oudenard was evacuated by the allies at the ſame time, and at this place the republicans found twenty-four pieces of artillery beſide the magazines with all the ammunition. At Tournay they found twenty guns ſpiked, ten thouſand muſket balls, a large quantity of gun-powder and two thouſand rations of forage and barley, and ſeveral magazines. Near that city they alſo took fourteen large barges laden with ammunition.

About this period a ſtatement of the loſs of the combined powers in killed, from the capture of Landrecy on the thirtieth of May, was preſented to the national convention; no other has been publiſhed, and this was never contradicted; indeed the reduced ſtate of the combined armies fully corroborate it. As it affords a curious ſpecimen of the ſtyle of the reports of that period it is given in an exact tranſlation from the original.

'On the ſecond Prairial (21ſt May) in the firſt combat near the wood of Bonne Eſperance, fifteen hundred ſlaves were killed.

'On the fifth Prairial (24th May) in the combat near the abbey of Obbe, fifteen hundred ſlaves.

'On the ſeventh Prairial (26th May) in the attack of Montigny, one thouſand.

'From the ſeventh to the fifteenth Prairial (3d June) when Charleroi was firſt blockaded, two thouſand Auſtrians.

'On the twenty-eighth Prairial (16th June) in the very bloody engagement on that day, ſix thouſand of their accomplices.

'On the thirtieth Prairial (18th June) near Harleymont, two thouſand.

'On the ſeventh Meſſidor (25th June) eight hundred bit the duſt.

'On the eighth Meſſidor (26th June) in the celebrated battle of Fleurus—in that battle which will eternally call to our remembrance the ſkilful march of the ſoldiers of the army of the Moſelle, who penetrated the woods of the Ardennes, and croſſed the rocks of the Meuſe, to afford an example of diſcipline to the enemy, and to beat the enemy at Charleroi, in concert with the armies of the North and Ardennes, in that battle we have ſtated the loſs of the allies to be between eight and ten thouſand. The repreſentatives of the people have informed us that the reports of deſerters ſince the battle of the eighth Meſſidor, eſtimate the loſs of the enemy at fifteen thouſand. On this part of the frontier the number of deſerters from the imperial ſtandard is ſix hundred. To this we may add the garriſon of Charleroi, which amounted to three thouſand ſlaves, and which ſurrendered at diſcretion.

'Total of the killed, &c. 31,600.

'On the ſide of the ſea the deficit is the ſame, during the ſhort period in which the French have over-run all Weſt Flanders.

'Beſides theſe ſix thouſand were taken and ſixty-ſeven pieces of cannon, in the battle fought before the capture of Ypres. To this number muſt be added the amount of the garriſon of Ypres, which is ſeven thouſand men.

'Let then this emperor Francis addreſs himſelf to his reverend fathers in God, and to his nobles and to his dearly beloved, to recruit that army which was to ſhake the walls of Paris, and re-eſtabliſh royalty.

'Three months are ſcarcely paſſed over ſince this crowned Auſtrian dared to tread upon the ſtill ſmoaking ruins of Landrecy, and to give each of his ſoldiers twenty-five ſous, with theſe words, "My children, have patience; in a few months I will grant you peace, and we will go and eſtabliſh our winter quarters at Paris." His winter quarters at Paris! Aſſuredly the road he has marked out is rather a curious one.'

The remainder of the campaign againſt the allies was ſo important, that no occaſion ſo opportune can be found at which to ſuſpend the hiſtory of its operations as the preſent, in order to take up the tranſactions of the other armies of the republic and to continue the intereſting but melancholy narrative of the proceedings of the faction which ſtill held authority over the lives and happineſs of the national repreſentatives.

The armies of the republic in the ſouth, were not leſs active, than thoſe in the north, and as ſucceſsful. In the begininng of February a battle was fought near St. Jean de Luz, in which the Spaniards were defeated; three of their regiments were taken priſoners or diſperſed, and the Iriſh regiment of Ultona, in the ſervice of Spain, infuriated by their prieſts who preached in their ranks againſt the French, maintained a conflict ſo deſparate that every man was cut to pieces. A ſimilar victory was obtained the fifth of the ſame month near the ſame place. In the eaſtern Pyrennees, the armies were not ſo early in motion. In April the Spaniards were compelled to evacuate Boulon and the camp of Ceret. The city of Urgel ſoon after ſurrendered to general Dagobert: but, as the citadel was in a condition for defence, and the Spainards had broken down the bridge which communicated with the town, the general retired to Puycerca to wait for reinforcements, where he was killed by a cannon ball. On the firſt of May a conſiderable victory was gained by the republicans at Ceret, two hundred pieces of cannon were taken with the Spaniſh camps, magazines, equipage, and two thouſand priſoners. About the ſame period the main army of the Spaniards was totally defeated near Collioure, and the whole of the baggage and artillery fell into the hands of the conquerers, and ſuch was the ſenſe of the convention on the importance of this victory, that a column was ordered to be erected on the ſpot with an inſcription—"Here ſeven thouſand Spaniards laid down their arms before the republicans." On the twenty-third of May St. Elmo was evacuated by the Spaniards, and port Vendries capitulated to general Dugommier.

In Italy the arms of the republic were equally triumphant. Early in April the city and poſt of Oneglia in Piedmont ſubmitted to the republic. As this port is ſituated on the Mediterranean and very near the ſouthern departments, its fall proved extremely injurious to the commerce of the enemies of the republic in that quarter, from the number of cruiſers which it regularly ſent out, and which the convention ſupplied with ſtores from the arſenals in order to render the attachment of the new citizens more firm and their felicity more fatal to their enemies. In proceeding to the attack of this place it was neceſſary for the republicans to paſs through the Genoeſe territory, but previous to this ſtep the commiſſioners Salicetti and Robeſpierre junior, publiſhed a proclamation promiſing the ſtricteſt regard to the neutrality of that republic, and reſpect for the peace and proſperity of its citizens. The Genoeſe were at firſt alarmed, conſidering how much they had already ſuffered from the barbarity of the Engliſh for their inflexible adherence to a pacific ſyſtem, the conduct of the French troops, however, was ſuch as to leave them no reaſon whatever to complain. This ſucceſs was immediately followed by a victory, in which five hundred men principally Auſtrians, were killed. Ormea on the Tanaro, and the county of Nava, immediatedy ſubmitted, ſo that the whole communication between Turin and the ſea, except through neutral countries appears to have been cut off. Immenſe magazines, a ſuperb manufactory of cloth, and large quantities of proviſions, cannon, and ammunition, fell at the ſame time into the hands of the victors.

In the beginning of May Dumerlion, the proviſional commander in chief of the army of Italy, poſſeſſed himſelf of the poſts of Saorgio, Belvedere, Rocabiliere, and St. Martin. The enemy were alſo obliged to abandon their famous camps at Fouche, and Raous. On this occaſion the French took ſixty pieces of cannon, an immenſe quantity of proviſions, and two thouſand priſoners. This was ſucceeded immediately by another victory in which Dumerlion drove the enemy, amounting to eight thouſand men, from their entrenchments near the village of Tende, and took ſome priſoners and ſtores.

About the middle of May, Dumas, commander of the army of the Alps, obtained a deciſive victory on Mount Cenis. The Sardinians had doubled their forces on this celebrated mountain; the French general therefore found it neceſſary to form a ſyſtem of vigorous diverſion, which ſhould extend along their whole line; the diſpoſition for this purpoſe were made with profound ſkill. On the night of the tenth, the fort Mirabouk was attacked by Caire, commander of the chaſſeurs, and the garriſon capitulated leaving twenty pieces of cannon, and conſiderable ſtores of proviſion and ammunition to the victors. At the ſame moment that Mirabouk was attacked, Dumas at the head of three thouſand men entered the rich vallies of Bordonack, the whole of the enemy's poſts were carried and the French eſtabliſhed themſelves at Oux. The general next croſſed the ſteep precipices of Gollibier, in order to proceed to Maurienne, and immediately to execute the principal object, the attack on Mount Cenis; and here it was that the courage, ſkill, and patience of the French were put to the ſevereſt teſt; from Lenebourg they aſcended the craggy ſteeps, amidſt a heavy and inceſſant fire; grape ſhot was poured upon them in ſhowers, and the heavy ſhot rebounding from the rocks, carried tenfold dangers into their ranks; but the French with almoſt incredible patience reſtrained their fire, excepting from a few cannon that had been dragged to an elevated point which raked the enemy's batteries, and entered the redoubts, with fixed bayonets. The left column, under general Bagdelune, made their way over precipices more frightful, and turned the enemy's flank. The junction of the columns was no ſooner effected, than the Piedmonteſe abandoned their well-appointed and numerous trains of artillery, their equipage, and magazines. The French purſued them for three leagues beyond Mount Cenis. The deſtruction was great; only nine hundred perſons were taken; but the French loſt only eight killed and thirty wounded.

On the borders of Italy and the Mediterannean, the arms of the republic were generally ſucceſsful; but in Corſica the intrigues of England had obtained a degree of ſucceſs which threw a momentary eclat over her political tranſactions, which ſerved to diſſipate the recollection of her diſgrace at Toulon. After admiral Hood left that place he cruiſed for ſome time of Hierres bay; and having detached a ſmall ſquadron to Corſica, repaired thither himſelf in the month of February, and found the iſland in a general ſtate of revolt.

The political connection between the people of this iſland and that of England, was not of a long ſtanding, nor of a very firm or durable nature; after the Corſicans had ſtruggled againſt the oppreſſion of the Genoeſe, and in 1768 were transferred to the dominion of France, the Engliſh government ſecretly ſupplied the Corſicans with ſtores and ammunition. An eccentric Scotch traveller poſſeſſed of a handſome fortune and weak intellects, in the courſe of the faſhionable European tour, ſtruck out of the ordinary path, and landed in Corſica, where his vanity found an untrod path upon which he hoped to eſtabliſh a reputation. Without any knowledge of the true character of the Corſicans, he publiſhed a book on the ſubject of their ſtruggles, and as his work was more allied to poetry than hiſtory, he choſe the ſimple chief of the Corſicans for his hero, and gave him a celebrity which neither his talents nor the ſtate of things entitled him to. The ſtruggle of the Corſicans was not for independence nor for an enlightened liberty, but for the choice of maſters, and Paoli was in fact only the head of a faction. Their ſtruggle terminated in being incorporated with France, and Paoli who had received the ſecret ſuccours of England was compelled to fly thither, where he enjoyed a penſion, until the commencement of the revolution in France, when he reſigned it, and under the ſanction of the conſtituent aſſembly, returning once more to his native country, was one of the foremoſt in applauding the revolution. He obtained the confidence of the ſeveral ſucceſſive adminiſtrations that had charge of the affairs of France, and was himſelf entruſted with a very ample authority in his native iſland.

His long reſidence in England and the ample ſupport which he had ſo long obtained there, muſt have naturally made very durable impreſſions on his mind. Habituated by education to obey a chief, and dazzled with the meritricious grandeur of the Engliſh court, his principles and his diſpoſition, were alike capable of embracing the views and objects of thoſe who oppoſed the French revolution. He had acted in concert with the Engliſh miniſtry from his return to Corſica, and upon the declaration of war againſt England, his attachment to France viſibly decreaſed, and the duties of the ſtation with which he was entruſted by the republic, were ſo entirely neglected, that he was called to Paris, to anſwer for his conduct. It has been noticed before in the courſe of this work, that he refuſed to go, on the alledged ground of ill health. On the appearance of the Britiſh troops at Toulon he no longer diſguiſed his reſolution to adhere to the Engliſh intereſts, and was ſucceſsful in deluding great numbers of his countrymen to follow him under the Britiſh banners. The republican troops ſtationed at Corſica had frequent occaſion during the year 1793, to lament the defection of Paoli, and ſeveral bitter conflicts had been the conſequence. When Hood arrived off the iſland, the garriſon of Mortella ſurrendered to him on the tenth of February. The tower of Torneli was abandoned by the republicans on the ſeventeenth, and in two days after St. Fiorenzo fell into his hands, the republicans being obliged to retreat to Baſtia.

The number of perſons capable of bearing arms in this city originally amounted to no more than three thouſand. The fortifications had been left in the worſt ſtate of repair, and even the garriſon was not half provided. Hood appeared before the place with the utmoſt diligence, Paoli who had collected a large body of his countrymen in the mountains, detached a conſiderable corps to co-operate with the Engliſh. The place was cloſely inveſted by ſea and land, and notwithſtanding the want that prevailed in the town, it reſiſted until the 19th of May, when the Engliſh admiral "in conſideration of the very "gallant defence made by the garriſon of Baſtia, and from principles of humanity," offered honorable terms to the republican commandant Gentili, which he was conſtrained from neceſſity to accept.

On the 24th the garriſon marched out with the honors of war, and the Engliſh took poſſeſſon of Baſtia. The loſs on either ſide has not been accurately aſcertained. But to the honor of the Corſicans under their countryman Gentili, they diſplayed a fidelity and attachment to the liberties of their country, which neither the ſecret proffers of the Engliſh, nor of their countrymen who had taken the oppoſite ſide, could weaken or ſhake. In conſequence of this ſucceſs the whole iſland, excepting the town of Calvi, and another ſmall diſtrict, ſubmitted to the Engliſh arms.

Upon this conqueſt being made known in England, letters of convocation were iſſued, and the general aſſembly of Corſica was ordered to be ſummoned; they met on Sunday the eighth of June at Corti. The letters ſpecified, that "the union of Corſica with Great Britain, and the tender of the crown to his majeſty," was the object of the meeting,—general Paoli was elected preſident; and opened the meeting by a ſpeech, in which he extolled the advantages of a union with England, and propoſed the tender of the crown to the king of England. After returning thanks to Paoli, the aſſembly paſſed two reſolutions, one declaring the ſeparation of Corſica from France, and the other its union with Great Britain. A committee was appointed to draw up articles of union, and it was declared "that all who came ſhould have voices, and in fact ſeveral perſons of "character and talents who were not even members of the aſſembly, were admitted and "took a ſhare in the diſcuſſion."

Such was the firſt repreſentation of the Corſican people. The conſtitution that was framed reſembles the French conſtitution of 1791 more than that of Great Britain, and it was diſtinguiſhed by this fundamental difference from the latter, that there was nothing equivalent to an houſe of lords; having only one chamber of repreſentatives, elected by a certain proportion of population, for two years, the repreſentative poſſeſſing property. The conſtitution conſiſts of twelve ſhort chapters, the tenth of which contains only three articles, and declares that "the catholic, apoſtolic, Roman religion, in all its evangelical "purity, ſhall be the only national religion of Corſica." But this conſtitution did not provide for the trial by jury in civil caſes.

Sir Gilbert Elliot was appointed the firſt viceroy. And it appears that England had undertaken to pay the whole expence of its civil and military eſtabliſhment.

The town of Calvi was ſoon after beſieged; general Caſabianca who commanded there, made a galiant reſiſtance till the tenth of Auguſt, when he ſurrendered on capitulation; and the garriſon marched out with the honors of war, and were tranſported at the expence of the Engliſh to Toulon.

The meaſure of annexing this iſland under the crown of England, even without conſidering that the very nature of the country, if it ſhould be reduced, muſt render it an eternal and fruitleſs expence, was one of the ſtrongeſt manifeſtations of incapacity and want of information or digeſted ſyſtem which the war exhibited. The folly was carried to the extreme by an order for annexing the Moor's head, which is the inſignia of the arms of Corſica, to thoſe of the Britiſh monarch!

But on the ocean her plans, though not calculated to produce benefits to the Britiſh nation, nor to overthrow the freedom of France, were yet ſucceſsful in obtaining that ſpecies of triumph which by elating her pride, encouraged the hopes and extravagance of her miniſters to the protraction of hoſtility. The ſtate of the French navy we have before had occaſion to notice; it was under the old regimen the lazy couch of an inſolent ariſtocracy; where talents were neither encouraged by the hopes of promotion nor allowed to compete for honors in the paths of merit. For ſome ſhort periods, men have appeared ſuperior to the vices and diſſipation of the French court, and devoting themſelves to the ſevere ſtudy of naval affairs, acquired for themſelves and their country a a bright reputation, as Suffrein, Piquet, and Peyrouſe. But at the commencement of the French revolution, France retained few of her experienced officers. The very nature of naval command is deſpotical; for the diſcipline of ſhips of war conſiſts wholly in a ſyſtem of ſeverity, which when conſidered renders the Spartan diſcipline no longer extraordinary, but comparatively mild. The equality of rights was not likely to comport with the heavy and lengthened chain of naval ſubordination. The empty vanity of titular diſtinctions, of official conſequence, the inconſequent hauteur of commiſſioned ſuperiority, were ſeverely ſhocked by a declaration of rights, wherein the admiral whoſe eſcutcheon quartered the arms of an hundred noble houſes, was to learn that his botſwain, or his boatſwain's ſwabber, had rights equal with his own.

Such a change was not calculated to produce even the moſt moderate ſhare of neceſſary attention to naval diſcipline, on the minds of men bred up in the groſſeſt of all ignorance. Of all men thoſe who have lived on board of ſhips of war for a time, are the leaſt regardful of moral obligations; their lives are an uniform ſcene of hardſhip, and of debauchery; ſecluded from the ſoftening influence of the virtuous of the fair ſex, they rarely know the joys of ſocial life; the paſſions ſo predominant in human nature lead them to exceſſes, which are at war with morals, and the continual indulgence of licentiouſneſs, creates diſpoſitions which are inimical to the firſt principles of ſociety. Men thus retain all the apathy and fierceneſs of the ſavage but little of the mildneſs or ſympathy of the man.

Such was the ſtate of the old French marine; ſuch is at of the Engliſh at preſent. The French in the carreer of their military ſucceſſes, had conceived the hope that the enthuſiaſm of her ſeamen alſo would ſupply the want of experience; but either forgetting the vaſt difference between the operations of men, or bodies of men, and a cumbrous and weildy machine, or numbers of them on an inconſtant element; or driven by neceſſity to take the riſks of their ſituation; the convention had turned their attention to the equipment of naval force.

Perhaps the efforts made by the Britiſh government to prevent the neutral powers from entering the French ports was the true ſource of this extraordinary effort of the French government; and the ſcarcity of proviſions which in general prevailed, had tended ſo much to aggravate the diſtreſſes of the country muſt have been a ſtill ſtronger ſtimulus.

They had firſt endeavoured to counteract England by detaching ſmaller ſquadrons and ſmall veſſels to annoy the commerce, and had met with vaſt ſucceſs; for in the month of May alone of this year, it appears, that they had taken ninty-nine Engliſh merchantmen, ten of which were outward bound Weſt Indiamen, and four homeward bound, and a packet from Liſbon laden with an immenſe ſum in ſpecie; while the Engliſh had taken in the ſame time only one frigate of thirty-eight guns.

There can be little doubt that this ſyſtem of naval operation was beſt ſuited to the circumſtances of France at that time, and the moſt fatal to her rival that ſhe could purſue in any circumſtances; but the preſſure of ſcarcity compelled them to equip a fleet, in order to protect a large convoy which was to ſail from the United States of America at a fixed period, laden with abundant ſupplies.

The Engliſh adminiſtration had obtained the moſt minute information concerning this fleet, and the expected convoy, and Admiral Howe, with twenty-ſix ſail of the line proceeded to ſea early in the month of May, with a view to intercept the convoy. On the 19th of May cruiſing off Breſt, he received advice that a French fleet had put to ſea ſome days before; and at the ſame time he received intelligence from the Engliſh admiral Montague who had been cruiſing with another ſquadron for ſome time in thoſe ſeas; admiral Howe determined immediately to form a junction with him, as he ſhould then have a great ſuperiority over the French fleet which he underſtood to conſiſt of twenty-ſix ſail alſo. On the 21ſt he received intelligence that the French fleet were but a few leagues to the weſtward, upon which the Engliſh admiral altered his courſe.

Early on the morning of the 28th the two fleets were diſcovered by their reſpective frigates, the French bearing down on the weather bow of the Engliſh. They advanced for ſome time in looſe order, and ſoon after hauled up to the wind; but were ſome hours before they could form in order of battle; this delay afforded time to the Engliſh admiral to detach a ſquadron of his fleet under rear-admiral Paiſley, with a view to take an advantageous ſtation and make an impreſſion on the French rear; meanwhile the two fleets approached.

The French fleet was commanded by rear admiral Villaret, a young officer who had been recently elevated from the rank of lieutenant and the command of a frigate to the poſt of rear-admiral and the command of the fleet. He had his flag on board the Mon-tagne, and Jean Bon St. Andre, a member of the convention, was on board the ſame ſhip in quality of commiſſioner.

The only accounts that have appeard of the action that took place, were thoſe officially written by the Engliſh admiral and the French commiſſioner. In the report of Jean Bon St. Andre he ſtates, that while the two fleets were monoeuvring, the Revolutionnaire, a three decker, ſlackened ſail, for what purpoſe was not underſtood; and the Engliſh rear-admiral Paiſley taking advantage thereof attacked this ſhip with his whole diviſion. In the conflict however the Engliſh rear-admiral had his top-maſt diſabled; and the Leviathan and Audacious puſhed up to ſupport him and attacked the Revolutionnaire, whoſe captain fell in the action, and the ſhip was ſo much damaged that ſhe was not manageable; night ſeparated the fleets, and the Revolutionnaire was towed into Rochefort by the Audacieux, a French ſeventy-four. During this day the wind blew freſh S. by W. with a rough ſea. Latitude 47. 33. N. Longitude 14. 10. W.

The fleets continued in ſight during the whole of the night, and on the morning of the twenty-ninth ſignals for the line were flying in both fleets. The Engliſh admiral intending to harraſs the French rear, ordered his fleet to tack; the French admiral penetrated his intention, and ordered ſuch manoeuvres as were calculated to fruſtrate his purpoſe, and directly the line was from van to rear, excepting a few ſhips, whoſe tardineſs in ſome degree obſtructed the evolution; however, the advance ſhips of the Engliſh were forced to give way and tack about. The delay in executing the admiral's ſignals occaſioned the French ſhips L'Indomptable and La Tyrannicide to be engaged with an infinitely ſuperior force, and they were in conſequence entirely diſabled. The French admiral now hoiſted the ſignal for tacking towards the rear, but this alſo was not obeyed, and the headmoſt ſhip of the line eſpecially keeping her ſtation without a movement, obliged the reſt of the line to remain fixed in order to prevent confuſion. The French admiral ſuppoſing himſelf betrayed by his own ſhips, determined upon a deſparate evolution, he tacked alone and threw out the ſignal for the fleet to follow, this ſignal was obeyed with the utmoſt alacrity by every ſhip but one. The line nevertheleſs was inſtantly formed, and the whole French line attacked the Engliſh with great ſpirit, and put them for a time into great diſorder. The Engliſh admiral after having arranged his line, threw out the ſignal for breaking through the French line, and a ſevere conflict enſued. The Cæſar, the leading ſhip, had not kept the wind, and the intended movement had nearly failed through that circumſtance and the prompt evolutions of the French admiral; the Engliſh admiral immediately tacked and was followed by the Belerophon and Leviathan, the two ſhips of the van next to the Cæſar, and paſſed directly between the fifth and ſixth of the French line, keeping up a ſteady and powerful fire, which was returned with equal firmneſs and regularity. The Engliſh admiral having paſſed through the line, followed by the other two ſhips, immediately put about to renew the attack, but the reſt of his line being by this time completely to the leeward and without the ſternmoſt ſhip of the French rear, he was obliged to tack and cloſe with his fleet; and the French admiral wore again to the eaſtward, in order to ſuccour his ſhips that had been in action. Having performed this evolution with great adroitneſs and ſucceſs, the French admiral again wore round and hoiſted his ſignal for the line of battle on the larboard tack, which was alſo followed by the Engliſh fleet, and both formed with admirable regularity in the ſame order.

The French had at the commencement of the action the advantage of the wind, but the manoeuvres that had been made enabled the Engliſh to gain it, and they withdrew under a crowded ſail, leaving behind them two ſhips, but they eſcaped being purſued only by ſome frigates. The engagement laſted between ſeven and eight hours, and the action was fought on the very ſpot over which the convoy from America was to paſs.

The French admiral attentive only to the main object of his cruiſe, the ſafety of the convoy on its way from America, had manœuvred with a view ſoley to keep the fleets out of the track in which the convoy was to come; ſtanding away occaſionally to the northward and eaſtward, and making ſhort tacks to the weſt; by this means he was obliged alſo to ſuffer the Engliſh fleet to keep the weather gage. A heavy fog prevailed during the thirtieth and thirty-firſt of May, and the fleets were occaſionally in ſight, but on the laſt evening the miſt cleared away, the Engliſh ſtill keeping the wind. The Engliſh admiral determined to make uſe of this great advantage in naval actions, and accordingly between ſeven and eight o'clock on the firſt of June, bore up with a view to cloſe action. The French admiral whoſe object was to be accompliſhed equally by an action which would cripple the Engliſh fleet and force them into port, and adroit manoeuvres, appeared equally eager to come to cloſe battle, and bore up alſo with great regularity.

The French fleet conſiſted on putting to ſea of twenty-ſeven ſail of the line three of which were three deckers; four ſhips of this fleet had been much exhauſted by a long cruize under admiral Neilly, the Revolutionnaire had been diſabled in the action of the twenty-eighth, and had gone into port.

When admiral Howe put to ſea he had thirty-ſix ſhips of the line, according to the liſts publiſhed; but his account publiſhed of the action reduces his fleet to twenty-five, the Audaciaous having been compelled to retire into port by the action of the twenty-eighth. The advantage in the number of ſhips therefore was one in favour of the French, but the Engliſh fleet had the ſuperiority in the ſize of their ſhips and the weight of their metal, having ſeven ſhips of three decks in their fleet, on board of which broad-penants were flying, the French had only three broad-penants. So that in weight and number of guns the Engliſh had the ſuperiority, as well as in the number of able and experienced officers, and in the condition of their ſhips.

Under theſe circumſtances the action commenced about nine o'clock, and laſted with unremitting fury till three! All the advantages of diſcipline and naval ſkill were on the ſide of the Engliſh. The French manoeuvred, however, with a degree of correctneſs that ſurpriſed their opponents. Their diſpoſitions were allowedly excellent, their ſhips were indeed generally old and crazy, and one of their captains (Gallin of the Jacobin,) had committed a falſe manœuvre, which enabled the Engliſh to cut off a part of the French line to the rear of the Montagne. The conteſt however was maintained with a degree of bravery on both ſides, that has if ever equalled, never been exceeded. Several ſhips in both fleets were diſmaſted, and the hulls of ſhips on both ſides ſo terribly wounded that they could ſcarcely keep the ſea; diſtinguiſhed above all was the Vengeur of ſeventy-four guns; the crew of this ſhip proved indeed to how high a degree the love of liberty can ſublimate the heart of man, and lead him to contemn the moſt terrible dangers and death itſelf; three Engliſh veſſels, one of which was a three decker, poured in broadſides at the Vengeur at the ſame inſtant, her maſts were all ſhot away, her colours had been torn to ribbons, and the fragments as frequently nailed to the ſtaff; ſeveral port holes were beat into one, and the ſhot holes were ſo numerous below water that ſhe was ſinking. "Picture to yourſelf

" this ſhip pierced through and through, open on all ſides, and raked by a larger ſhip from " her ſtern; her helm unmanagable, not a rope of running rigging whole, her decks " ſpread over with the dead and dying, the waves already cover the mouths of her lower " guns—they are under water—but her upper tiers ſtill pour out inceſſant broadſides, ſhe " gradually ſinks—the gallant crew ſee the abyſs of death before them, and their only " thoughts are to die with honor; their colours every inſtant ſhot away, and freſh co- " lours are ſupplied; the ſtumps of the ſhattered maſts are ornamented with new ſtrea- " mers—ſhouts of Vive la Republique, Vive la Liberte, are heard amidſt the thunder of can- " non which never ceaſe to fire—the enemy ſee the Vengeur ſinking, they haſten to retire " from the vortex that is about to involve her, and the general diſcharge of her guns, " and a ſhout of Vive la Republique is the laſt memorial of her gallant crew—they have " diſappeared with the accents of freedom on their lips."

The action had been general and cloſe in leſs than an hour after its commencement. The oppoſed admirals had been deſparately engaged; at the cloſe of the action the van of the French had given way and got half a league to leeward; this falſe ſtep, defeated the French admiral's purpoſe of tacking, by which he would have not only covered his own diſabled ſhips, but cut off thoſe of the Engliſh alſo. By this means, he had only the choice left of going to the aſſiſtance of the rear, or rallying the van, the latter was the moſt uſeful meaſure, but by it he loſt way. The Engliſh fleet, however, were ſo much crippled, that they ceaſed firing firſt according to the French accounts; the Engliſh accounts do not deny this; but ſix of the French ſhips were ſo badly diſabled as to be unfit to make ſail, and the Engliſh having the wind were enabled to throw their unhurt ſhips between them and the French line; ſeveral others, of the French were in as bad a condition, and it is a concluſive evidence of the bad ſtate of the Engliſh, that ſeveral of the diſabled French ſhips were towed off by a corvette mounting only eight four pounders, and within gun ſhot of the Engliſh ſhips, who did not fire a ſingle gun at her; two or three other French ſhips had no other means left but their ſprit-ſails. But ſix remained in poſſeſſion of the Engliſh, and were carried into Plymouth, viz. La Juſt, La Sans Pareille, L'America, L'Achille, L'Impeteux, and Northumberland, which with the Vengeur ſunk makes the loſs of the French to conſiſt of ſeven line of battle ſhips.

The number of men killed in action on both ſides was conſiderable. Captain Bazire of the Montagne, the French Admiral's ſhip, was killed, and Jean Bon St. Andre was wounded, eighteen officers only were able to remain at their poſts to the cloſe of the action, and nearly three hundred killed and wounded on board the ſame ſhip; ſhe received three hundred and thirty ſhot in her hull. In the ſix ſhips taken were ſix hundred and ninety killed and five hundred and eighty wounded.

The number of the Engliſh killed was, by return two hundred and ſeventy-two, and ſeven hundred and eighty-ſeven wounded; among their killed was the captain of the Montagu; and three admirals among the wounded, two of whom and the captain of the Queen had each loſt a leg.

In its conſequences this action was very important in many points of view. The Engliſh by having the wind at the cloſe of the action, and not making uſe of it to renew the attack, evinced that the French with an inferior force, inferior diſcipline, and the diſadvantage of the wind could meet them and diſable them in ſo great a degree as not only to defeat the object of the Engliſh fleet, but to obtain the object which they themſelves had in view. The French fleet not only proved their capacity to conteſt with the Engliſh upon equal terms, but that with equal diſcipline and equal ſhips, the iſſue of an action, merely for the honor of victory would be at leaſt uncertain. And that any object depending upon the protection of a Britiſh fleet might be fruſtrated only by an inferior French fleet entering into a naval action.

The French conſoled themſelves on the loſs of their ſhips, with the very diſtinguiſhed bravery of their fleet, and the evidence which the action furniſhed of what France would be capable of accompliſhing under her republican energy as ſoon as circumſtances admit of her turning her earneſt attention to a naval force. They had alſo the ſatisfaction by this action of ſecuring the ſafe arrival of the convoy of one hundred and ſixty ſail of veſſels from America, with a cargo valued at eight millions ſterling, conſiſting of naval ſtores and proviſions, of the latter of which France was then ſo much in want as to be threatened with a famine. In this latter view, the defeat was equal to a victory, ſince it prevented that calamity, and fruſtrated all the efforts that England had made to prevent proviſions paſſing from neutral nations into France. This valuable convoy arrived in the port of L'Orient a few days after the action, and the veſſels paſſed through the wrecks of maſts and timber which had been made by the conflict.

France, relieved from the alarming preſſure of famine, was now enabled to turn her attention undiverted to the great concerns of offenſive and defenſive tactics. A very curious and intereſting account of the ſtate of the republic at this period has been publiſhed by a French count,* who was employed as a ſpy by the Engliſh court, and reſided in France for a conſiderable time. Upon his return to England his employers ſlighted him, and the ſtipulated reward of his dangerous and intelligent ſervices was but partially paid, and at length wholly withdrawn. His account throughout diſplays a comprehenſive underſtanding, although the prejudices of the old noble and inveterate emigrant break through his narrative, upon many occaſions; the correctneſs of his general ſtatement, however, has been confirmed by ſubſequent events, and it has been ſaid, that his accuracy and truth were among the cauſes which rendered his ſervices diſagreeable to the Engliſh miniſters.

Speaking of the ſtate of France in May, 1794, he ſays—'The power, the action, the right of ſovereignty, are concentrated in the committee of public ſafety. The thirty committees, among whom are divided the labours of the convention, have no ſhare in the actual executive government; they are ignorant of the meaſures of the committees until they are executed; but the greateſt activity every where prevails in the execution; laws are made, roads are conſtructed, and canals dug, all at the ſame moment. The moſt abundant reſources are laviſhed, public ſchools eſtabliſhed, and the French language carried to the foot of the Pyrennees and amidſt the heaths of lower Britanny. One ſitting frequently produces fifty decrees, upon objects the moſt remote, orders fifty millions to execute them, and every where erects ſcaffolds againſt thoſe who might be elſe diſpoſed to oppoſe them. In finances the convention is richer than all Europe united, ſeven-ninths of the ſoil belongs to the republic; and this continual pledge of paper credit is now become inexhauſtible, by the rapidity with which property is exchanged, and always to the advantage of the aſſembly. They have already conceived the project to nationalize the whole ſoil of France, to regiſter the territory like a public debt in a great book; and to reſume the property of the clergy and nobles, purchaſed as they aſſert at a price below its value. About twenty millions ſterling are depoſited in gold and ſilver in the coffers of the national convention. The mint of Paris, to which was tranſported all the bullion of the ſuppreſſed provincial mints, contains about three millions of pounds ſterling in metal; and daily additions are thrown in by depoſits, collections, and penalties. The riches of the church produced near 1,350,000 pounds ſterling, and through the whole extent of France there no longer remains a ſacred vaſe of the precious metals, not even in the domeſtic chapels.

* The count de Montgaillard.

'The military committee directed by Carnot, La Fitte, d'Aniſſi, and others, draw the projects of campaigns, and plans of attack, combine operations, and adapt their tactics to the ſpirit of the revolution. From the memoirs, and from all the veſtiges of the exploits, the zeal, and intelligence of the great generals, miniſters, and ſtateſmen, who adorned the old government, theſe men have extracted the means of its annihilation—850,000 effective men fight under the orders of the committee of public ſafety, and this number may be augmented. After the harveſt and ſowing ſeaſon have aſſured the future ſubſiſtence of their new ſoldiers, when they are no longer uſeful at home, we may fear that France in the end of the campaign will adopt ſome alarming meaſure, of war, generally offenſive.' The event diſplayed the ſagacity of the Engliſh emiſſary; and he foretold with the ſame intuitive ſpirit, facts of a more intricate nature, 'Even Robeſpierre,' ſays he, 'may be brought to the block without occaſioning any grand convulſion. The ſpirit of the revolution would ſurvive ſuch events.' Theſe were opinions too hoſtile to the fond and blind deſires of the Engliſh miniſtry, who, deluded by their ambition, as they had been in the wanton and oppreſſive hoſtility againſt America, would liſten to no counſels but ſuch as were favourable to their wiſhes, and conſidered thoſe as enemies who propoſed truths that detected their errors.

In the midſt of the ſtruggles of faction, thoſe who ſecretly endeavoured to call back the French nation from its diſtractions, were conſtantly, propoſing ſome benevolent or philoſophical project; or offering ſome tribute to exalted genius, which might tend to reſtore the public mind to ſober and moral thinking without endangering freedom. The aſhes of Deſcartes had been removed to the pantheon in the laſt year; the remains of Rouſſeau, were now propoſed to be honoured in the ſame way; a deputation accompanied by Rouſſeau's widow made the requeſt at the bar of the convention; the application was converted into a motion by Lequino, and decreed with unanimous applauſe.

Several other decrees were paſſed about the ſame time; one obliged all aged non-juring clergymen to repair to their reſpective departments, where houſes were prepared for their reception. Perſons concealing eccleſiaſtics ſubject to baniſhment, were made liable to the ſame puniſhment. State coaches and other enſigns of royalty were aboliſhed. Men of the firſt requiſition or thoſe abſent upon furlough were obliged to return to their corps, The laws of divorce were newly regulated, and the wives of emigrants forbidden to marry foreigners; this law was intended to prevent a means of evaſion that had been purſued, by contracting pretended marriages with Swiſs and others, and that way obtaining a means of flight from the country.

Several diſcoveries were made about this time, of quantities of aſſignats forged in England; a quantity had been found among other depoſits at Oſtend, amounting to the nominal value of 2,270,010 livres; and paſſports had been iſſued by the public agents of the emperor to let them paſs free of the uſual duties on paper, through the emperor's dominions. Unleſs in the inſtance of the forgeries committed by the Britiſh government during the American revolution, perhaps there does not exiſt in hiſtory ſo ſhameleſs and immoral a violation of ſocial probity,—the following are copies of the paſſports iſſued on this occaſion, "under God's holy protection"---they ſupercede all comment.

'The treaſurer general, counſellor and clerk of domains and finances, of the emperor and king:—To the principal officers at Oſtend:

'Very dear and faithful friends, M. Dufour having demanded permiſſion to have forwarded to Liege a trunk containing aſſignats addreſſed to him, and arrived at Oſtend, we authorize you by this preſent to forward it accordingly free of all duties. You will do the ſame with reſpect to any aſſignats which may be hereafter forwarded by you to the ſame deſtination. May God keep you under his holy protection. (ſigned) Bouniſet.'

'Council of finances, Bruſſels, May twenty-ſixth, 1794.

(A true Copy) 'Dolbannaud.'

'Principal office of Oſtend. Extract from the regiſter of paſſports, June the third, 1794.

'Paſs to Liege, by the way of Dormael, a trunk containing aſſignats, free from all duties, conformably to an order of council, bearing date May twenty-ſixth ult, and to the addreſs of Dufour. (ſigned) Libne.

'Oſtend July the fourth, 1794. (A true Extract.) 'Dolbannaud.'

Another ſubject equally extraordinary was brought before the convention about this time. In relating the tranſactions of the tenth of Auguſt 1792, the conſtruction of an iron cloſet containing the ſecret papers of the king, was noticed. This ſubject was now brought before the convention in conſequence of a petition from the ſmith who conſtructed that repoſitory, claiming aſſiſtance. A member ſtated that Francois Gamain lock-ſmith of the cabinets and laboratory of the late king, and three years ſince a member of the commune of Verſailles, had declared that in the beginning of 1792 he received orders to come to Paris, and was directed by the king to conſtruct a ſecret cloſet in one of the walls of his apartment with an iron door, which was not finiſhed until the end of May in that year, when employed in finiſhing it, the king himſelf brought a large bottle of wine, which he deſired the ſmith to drink, he being very warm. That on returning home in ſome hours afterwards, he was ſeized with violent pains, which did not ceaſe till he had taken an emetic. After which he contiuued ill for fourteen months, and was then after ſuch a lapſe of time ſo far from recovered that he was unable to attend his buſineſs. That the information from this citizen was the means of diſcovering the proofs of conſpiracy againſt the late king and others his agents; that after twenty-ſix years of ſervice and the ſacrifices he had made the leaſt that could be done was to allow him ſuitable means of ſupport, being diſabled by the effects of the poiſon given him, from obtaining ſubſiſtence.—The convention, after hearing the facts alleged by Gemain, and they being delivered in writing very minutely and at large, decreed:—

I. That the papers relating to the proof of this repreſentation be referred to the committee of aids and liquidations to report thereupon.

II. After their report that they ſhall be depoſited among the archives of the convention as an eternal monument of the baſeneſs and perfidy of Capet.

III. That they ſhall likewiſe be publiſhed, in order to make known to the univerſe the wickedneſs of the laſt tyrant of the French.

The complaint of Gemain exhibits a very awful ſubject of reflection indeed, to the mind; charity, which extenuates the errors of thoſe who have fallen, which would fain 'let the good which men do live after them, and the evil be buried with their bones,' turns with an averted and ſuſpicious eye from a relation ſo dark and diabolical, and would fain diſbelieve it; the character of Louis had never been charged with a purpoſe ſo mean; the ſituation and health of the perſon who laid the charge could not be an impoſture; the circumſtances and period of his alleged ill-health could be minutely aſcertained; or the illneſs might have been accidental, or even the effect of drinking an innocent beverage when over-heated.

About the ſame time the convention having referred to a committee, certain documents concerning abuſes committed by the farmers general under the old governmert, developed a ſcene of long concealed iniquity that renders ſtill more clear the neceſſity of the revolution; they had been guilty of the groſſeſt exactions, and in ſome caſes where they were authoriſed to levy the heavy amount of four per cent, taxes; they had actually levied ten per cent. A great clamour was raiſed againſt this meaſure as an ex poſt facto proceeding, and aſſerting that thoſe robbers ſhould be tried by the laws of the government under which the crimes were committed; as if the acts was not immoral and criminal becauſe committed under the monarchy; as if juſtice was only a creature of convenience, and that the nation did not exiſt until the monarchy had ceaſed. They were taken to the revolutionary tribunal on the 5th of May, and they expiated their crimes on the ſcaffold, as an example to villains of all nations, that the reign of corruption cannot be for ever, and that juſtice will not admit of the generality of vice as an exemption from that puniſhment which is due to the ſupporters of tyranny and groſs turpitude.

To enter on the detail of perſons and characters who fell either the victims of juſtice or of faction, would incumber the hiſtory with a liſt of names whoſe vices forbid notice, or whoſe characters where no otherwiſe remarkable then by becoming often for their virtues the victims of the controlling tyrant. One victim, however, rendered illuſtrious by her misfortunes and her alliances, demands a particular regard. The ſiſter of the late king. On the 10th of May, Fouquier Tinville, the public accuſer, made a formal demand, to the commune of Paris, that Elizabeth Capet ſhould be delivered up to the revolutionary tribunal. On the ſame day ſhe was conveyed to the Conciergerie, and on the 12th went through the forms of a ſeries of interrogatories, which was called a trial.

No witneſſes were called, no papers produced criminating her. She neither impugned the exiſting authorities, nor had ſhe been party in any plot. When queſtioned concerning the conſpiracy of 1789, ſimply anſwered ſhe had no knowledge of any. She acknowledged accompanying her brother to Varennes, but conceived it to be no crime. She was aſked concerning her diamonds, and if ſhe had not ſent her jewels to the Emigrant princes? She acknowledged ſhe had placed them in the hands of Choiſeul, but knew not what became of them. She was charged with having encouraged her nephew in the hopes of ſucceeding to the throne; ſhe replied, "I have converſed familiarly with that unfortunate child, who is dear to me on more than one account; and I have given him all the conſolations which appeared to me likely to reconcile him to the loſs of thoſe who had given him birth." The two laſt charges appear to be the only circumſtances upon which a colour of criminality could be even preſumed. She was condemned without further interrogatory, her laſt reply being decreed ſufficient evidence of her having encouraged hopes in the ſon of the late king to obtain the throne. She was carried to the place of execution, and ſuffered the laſt of twenty-ſix perſons.

Terror and miſery had now ſaddened every mind; Paris the gay, the brilliant, where every heart bounded with gaiety, and every eye ſparkled with delight, was now the ſeat of gloomy horror and diſtruſt. The citizens in general ſaw with ſtupified terror thoſe proceſſions of death that daily encumbered the ſtreets, and the feelings of ſympathy and indignation were only repelled by that fatal impreſſion, that ſo often prevails under tyranny and in calamitous times, that every man's neighbour is an informer, and that ſilence and ſubmiſſion are the only means of ſecurity. Even in the boſom of his family no man dared to utter a complaint but in whiſpers, leſt any one ſhould hear the forbidden expoſtulations of humanity, and denounce him as a counter-revolutioniſt. Many perſons wearied of ſpectacles of horror put an end to their exiſtence.

In the midſt of theſe ſcenes ſo baleful and repugnant to humanity, the arch-murderer and impoſtor led the enchained nation to inſult the divinity by a ſolemn farce;—that monſter—Robeſpierre, who violated all precepts and all principles, knew how deep the impreſſions of religion ſink into the heart; no circumſtance that could inſure his influence with the ignorant million, was left unpractiſed or uncultivated; and as he had drowned the recollection of ſucceſſive ſacrifices, by new proſcriptions, by keeping public attention alarmed or awakened by ſome new object, he now meditated to drown his murders in a ſolemn mockery of heaven.

On the ſeventeenth of May he made a report to the convention on the ſubject of worſhip, with a view to dedicate the decades of the new calender to religious duties. After an inflated declamation too contemptible for particular notice, he propoſed a decree of eleven articles, which was adopted:—The firſt of theſe decrees that the French nation acknowledges a ſupreme being and the immortality of the ſoul. 2. That the worſhip worthy of God conſiſts in ſerving our fellow creatures. 3. It ranks among his duties the deteſtation of treachery, and tyranny, puniſhment of traitors, ſuccouring the wretched, defending the oppreſſed, reſpecting the weak, the avoiding of injuſtice, and performing all poſſible good. By the fifth, the feſtivals were to be named either after the glorious events of the revolution, or thoſe virtues deareſt and moſt beneficial to man. By the eighth freedom of religious worſhip is eſtabliſhed. By the eleventh a feſtival is appointed to be celebrated on the eighth of June, in honour of the ſupreme being.

The day arrives—And David, that painter, whoſe pencil rivalled the firſt maſters of Italy, was to be the mean marſhal of this mockery;—at this ſpot by David's command, the mother's are to embrace their daughters—at that, the fathers are to claſp their ſons—here, the old are to bleſs the young, and there, the young are to kneel to the old—upon this boulevard the people are to ſing—upon that, they muſt dance—at noon they muſt liſten in ſilence, and at ſun-ſet they muſt rend the air with acclamations.

Ah! what was then become of thoſe civic feſtivals which hailed the firſt glories of the revolution! What was become of that ſublime federation of an aſſembled nation which had nobly ſhaken off its ignominious fetters, and exulted in its new-born freedom! What was become of thoſe moments when no emotions were pre-ordained, no feelings meaſured out, no acclamations decreed; but when every boſom beat high with admiration, when every heart throbbed with enthuſiaſtic tranſport, when every eye melted into tears, and the vault of heaven reſounded the burſts of unpremeditated applauſe!

But let us not even now deſpair of the cauſe of liberty. Let us not abandon the fair and noble region filled with objects which excite the thrill of tenderneſs or the glow of admiration, becauſe along the path which France has choſen ſerpents have lurked beneath the buds of roſes, and beaſts of prey have iſſued from the lofty woods; let us diſcover, if we can, a leſs tremendous road, but let us not renounce the land of promiſe.

The citizens of Paris had been invited, and the invitation amounted to a command, to decorate their houſes in honour of the feſtival. Accordingly Paris on that morning, lighted up by brilliant ſunſhine, preſented the moſt gay and charming ſpectacle imaginable. Woods had been robbed of their ſhade, and gardens to the extent of ſome leagues rifled of their ſweets, in order to adorn the city. The walls of every houſe were covered with luxuriant wreaths of oak and laurel, blended with flowers; civic crowns were interwoven with national ribbands; three-coloured flags waved over every portal; and the whole was arranged with that light and airy grace which belongs to Pariſian fancy. The women wore garlands of freſh blown roſes in their hair, and held branches of palm or laurel in their hands—the men placed oaken boughs in their hats, and children ſtrewed the way with violets and myrtle. The repreſentatives of the people had large three-coloured plumes in their hats, national ſcarfs thrown acroſs their ſhoulders, and noſe-gays of blended wheat-ears, and flowers in their hands, as ſymbols of their miſſion.

From this profuſion of gay objects, which in happier moments would have excited delightful ſenſations, the drooping ſoul now turned diſtaſteful. The ſcent of carnage ſeemed mingled with theſe laviſh ſweets; the glowing feſtoons appeared tinged with blood, and in the back ground of this feſtive ſcenery the gullotine aroſe before the diſturbed imagination.

A great amphitheatre was raiſed in the garden of the Thuilleries immediately before the palace, now the ſeat of the convention. Upon a tribune in the centre of the theatre, Robeſpierre as preſident of the convention appeared; and having for a few hours diſencumbered the ſquare of the revolution of the gullotine, this high-prieſt of Moloch, within view of that very ſpot where his daily ſacrifice of human victims was offered up, covered with their blood, invoked the Parent of univerſal nature, talked of the charms of virtue, and breathed the hope of immortality! When the foul fiend had finiſhed this impious mockery, he deſcended from the tribune, and walked with great ſolemnity towards a groteſque kind of monument that was raiſed upon the baſon in the front of the palace, which had been covered over for that purpoſe. On this monument was placed a miſhapen and hideous figure, with aſs's ears, which for ſome hours ſerved as an enigma to the gazing crowd, who knew not how to account for this ſingular appearance; till Robeſpierre having ſet fire to this image of deformity, which was declared to be the ſymbol of atheiſm, its cumbrous drapery ſuddenly vaniſhed, and a fair and majeſtic form was diſcovered, emblematical of wiſdom and philoſophy.

Atheiſm being thus happily deſtroyed, the convention, attended by a numerous proceſſion of people, and preceded by triumphal cars and banners, marched to the Champ de Mars, where with much toil and coſt a rocky mountain had been reared, upon whoſe lofty ſummit the tyrant and his attendants climbed, and from whence he once more harangued the people; and the feſtival cloſed with hymns and choral ſongs in honor of the ſupreme being.

Robeſpierre on this day, intoxicated with his power, loſt ſight of his uſual prudence, and diſplayed all the littleneſs of his vanity. He cauſed a line of ſeparation to be made between himſelf and the other deputies of the convention, and marched at ſome diſtance before them, like a captain at the head of his band. He had the folly to diſplay his importance by keeping the convention and the aſſembled multitude waiting, and the ceremony ſuſpended for two hours, while he was ſought for in vain. During the proceſſion his creatures attempted to raiſe the cry of "Vive Robeſpierre!" but it was faintly re-echoed by the ſpectators, many of whom followed him with curſes, not loud but deep, which the poor heart would fain deny, but dare not.

Two days after this feſtival in honour of the ſupreme being, Robeſpierre, the ſcourge of his creatures, compelled the enſlaved convention to paſs a law, which permitted the revolutionary jury to condemn thoſe who were brought before them, from their own internal conviction, without any proof whatever or hearing any witneſſes; and which alſo ſuppreſſed the ſuperfluous office of official defender, or counſel; a privilege that Couthon, who made the report in the name of the committee of public ſafety, aſſerted conſpirators by no means deſerved. In other words, the jury were now authoriſed to paſs ſentence without even the forms of trial. From this period to the fall of Robeſpierre, all the judicial ſolemnities of the revolutionary tribunal conſiſted in reading over the names of the accuſed, who were immediately after declared by the jury to be guilty of a conſpiracy againſt the ſafety of the French people, and the indiviſibility of the French republic.

If any of the unhappy perſons thus proſcribed attempted to ſpeak in their defence, they were thus ſilenced by the preſident: "It is not your turn to ſpeak," and if they perſiſted in declaring their innocence, they were put what was called "hors de debats;" that is, ordered immediately out of the court, condemned in their abſence, and ſent to execution. "I was not in priſon when this conſpiracy took place," cried madame de Noailles, madame Lafayette's ſiſter. "But you would have been in the conſpiracy if you had been there," anſwered the preſident; and this unfortunate lady, the mother of three children, periſhed with her own mother and grandmother. Madame Lafayette being in another priſon was, in the hurry of forming the liſts of death, forgotten when her family ſuffered—and ſtill lived to undergo new ſorrows. From this period the priſons became ſcenes of unaccountable horror and deſpair. Till now, the crowds by which they were inhabited had ſubmitted to their fate with that cheerful reſignation, and often with that careleſs gaiety which is buoyant at a Frenchman's heart in circumſtances that would altogether overwhelm the ſinking ſpirits of the people of other countries.

During the long interval which paſſed between preſenting the report and celebrating the feſtival, ſome events took place which it is neceſſary to note. On the morning of the twenty-fifth of May, an attempt was made to aſſaſſinate Collot d'Herbois, a member of the committee of public ſafety, as he was walking the ſtreet. The aſſaſſin's name was Ameral, who, after diſcharging a piſtol at Collot, immediately returned to his lodgings, which he fortified in the beſt manner he was able. Collot requeſted Geoffroi with whom he was walking to call a municipal officer while he purſued Ameral to his lodgings. Ameral having loaded ſeveral piſtols threatened inſtant death to whoever ſhould attempt to enter his apartments. Collot, however, endeavoured to break open the door, but Goeffroi prevented him, exclaiming "I demand you in the name of the people to remain here. I will put this villain under the axe of the law or periſh in the attempt—To exterminate ſuch men is to practiſe juſtice and virtue." He immediately broke open the door ruſhed upon Ameral, diſarmed and ſecured him, not however before Goeffroi was wounded by the diſcharge of the aſſaſſin's piſtol.

Upon inſtituting an enquiry into the ſituation and profeſſion of Ameral, it was found he had belonged to the guards, and was diſmiſſed on the threatened invaſion of Brunſwick. He acknowledged on his trial that the meant to aſſaſſinate Robeſpierre and Collot. That he had become weary of exiſtence, and reſolved to render his country a ſervice by the act. He gloried in the attempt and lamented that it had not been ſucceſsful. He aſſerted that no perſon was connected with him, and had even procured arms by the ſale of his effects.

On the ſame day at nine o'clock in the evening, a young female, about twenty years of age knocked at the door of Robeſpierre's lodging, and deſired to ſpeak to him; being informed that he was not at home, ſhe ſaid—"It is very aſtoniſhing that, as he is a public functionary, he is not at home. Poſſeſſing ſuch a ſituation as he does, he ought to be always ready, to ſee thoſe who have buſineſs with him."

Her mode of expreſſion excited ſuſpicion, ſhe was ſtopped and carried before the committee of public ſafety. On the way thither ſhe exclaimed "that during the old government the king was acceſſible at all times, and that ſhe would ſpill every drop of her blood to reſtore the ancient government." Being introduced to the committee ſhe ſaid her name was Aimée Cecile Regnault, twenty years old, the daughter of a ſtationer in the ſection of La Cité. Being queſtioned on her trial what ſhe wanted of Robeſpierre, ſhe replied that "ſhe only wanted to ſee what kind of a being a tyrant was." Two knives were found upon her. She ſuffered death with Ameral and ſixty-nine others, brought from different parts of the republic upon counter-revolutionary accuſations.

This attempt on Robeſpierre's life had raiſed his popularity to the higheſt; and in the convention he took occaſion to diſcant upon it in a ſtyle ſo hypocritical as to render the compariſon between him and Cromwell even more than uſually complete. He returned thanks to God that he and his party had ſerved their country ſo well as to be deemed worthy of the poniards of tyrants. It was a ſpectacle, he ſaid, worthy of heaven and earth to behold the repreſentatives of the French people, ſtationed on the almoſt inexhauſtible volcano of conſpiracies, placing with one hand at the feet of the great eternal the homage of a mighty people, and with the other launching the thunder-bolts againſt the tyrants of the earth.

It is impoſſible to reflect without emotions of diſguſt, on the crimes of this monſter and his continual profeſſions of devotion to the great eternal. In every age, in every nation, religion has been the uniform maſk of tyrants and knaves. Religion! Venerable ſource of ſecret joy, emanation of affection and gratitude, ſweet reconciler of man to his being, ſtrong bond that unites the individual with the cauſe of his exiſtence! Wiſdom's ſolemn and ineffable tie, which diſdains alike the trammels of ceremony and the proud boaſts of oſtentation! Which builds her loved abodes in the modeſt receſſes of the heart! Who ſhuns the haunts of worldly cunning that ſo often aſſumes her name! Benignant ſympathy, that turns with ſorrowing eye and iron tears from the abuſes, the hypocriſy, the crimes, which are perpetrated under the ſacred ſhadow of thy name!

On the 28th of May a report was laid before the convention by the Committee of Public Welfare, on the formation of a military ſchool—the decree was paſſed in the following terms :—

I. There ſhall be ſent to Paris, from each diſtrict of the Republic, ſix young Citizens, under the name of Eleves de l'Ecole de Mars, from the age of ſixteen to ſeventeen and a half, to receive, by a revolutionary education, all the knowledge and habits of a Republican ſoldier.

II. The agents of the diſtricts ſhall make choice, without delay, of ſix pupils from the children of the Sans-Culottes. One half of theſe pupils ſhall be taken from citizens of ſmall income in the country, the other from the towns; a preference being given to wounded volunteers, and to thoſe ſerving in the armies of the Republic.

III. The National Agents ſhall chooſe the beſt formed, the moſt robuſt, intelligent, and thoſe who have given the beſt proofs of civiſm and good conduct.

IV. The Eleves of the ſchool ſhall come to Paris on foot, and unarmed: they ſhall travel as the Defenders of the Republic, and ſhall receive a ſtate of the route. One ſhall have the care of the reſt, and ſhall be reſponſible for their conduct.

V. The National Agents of the diſtricts ſhall be authoriſed to give them the neceſſary ſtate of the route to Paris. They ſhall take ſuch meaſures that the Eleves of their vicinity ſhall march ten days after the receipt of the preſent decree by the Bulletin.

VI. None ſhall be received in the Military School after the 20th Meſſidor.

VII. The Military School ſhall be formed on the Plains of Sablons, near Paris.

VIII. The Commune of Paris, on account of its population, ſhall furniſh twenty-four Eleves. They ſhall be choſen as in the diſtricts, and the liſt ſhall be ſubmitted for the approbation of the Committee of Public Welfare.

IX. The Eleves of the Military Schools ſhall be clothed, armed, and fed, at the expence of the Republic.

X. They ſhall be exerciſed in the uſe of Arms, the manœuvres of Infantry, Cavalry, and Artillery. They ſhall learn the principles of the Art of War and Fortification. They ſhall be trained to fraternity, diſcipline, frugality, good manners, love of their country, and a hatred of Kings.

XI. They ſhall remain in tents as long as the ſeaſon will permit.

XII. The Military School is to be under the immediate inſpection and management of the Committee of Public Welfare.

XIII. The inſertion of the preſent decree in the Bulletin ſhall be conſidered as its publication.

On the 30th of May, Barrere making uſe of ſome recent diſcoveries of the machinations of the Engliſh government, and of the meaſures and declarations of the miniſters and ſome members of the Engliſh parliament connected with them, introduced the conduct of England to the notice of the convention in a long and minute ſtatement of the artifices and treacheries which had been practiſed againſt the liberties of France; he quoted the letter addreſſed by lord Auckland to the Dutch government prior to the commencement of open war, and ſhewed that the conduct of the government was in perfect alliance with Auckland's letter; he quoted a ſpeech of that lord delivered in the Britiſh Houſe of Peers on the occaſion of a meſſage delivered by the Engliſh king on the 28th of April concerning the enormous ſubſidy lately granted to Pruſſia; wherein that lord ſaid —" that he had always thought this war ſhould he waged uſque ad internecionem"—that lord Mansfield, Mr. Windham, and earl Fitzwilliam, as well as Mr. Burke, had repeatedly declared in the ſame terms, that the war was and ought to be againſt France an inſidious exterminating war; that Burke had declared on the 17th of April in public debate, that if one individual of thoſe traitors and aſſaſſins which England has armed and equipped under Moira, to throw them on the ſhores of the republic to ſpread deſolation on the country that gave them birth,—he declared that if one of theſe ſhould be executed as traitors, that England ſhould retaliate on the republican priſoners ſhe ſhould take fighting in defence of their country and its liberties; he noticed the defence of the treaty of Pilnitz delivered in the Engliſh Houſe of Commons by Mr. Jenkinſon on the 6th of March, and the declaration of Earl Mansfield in the Houſe of Peers on the ſame day that Auckland had declared the war to be an inſidious and exterminating war; and that Mansfield had ſupported the doctrine; that Pitt and his co-adjutors Grenville and Dundas had maintained the ſame ſame doctrines; and that the inſtructions to ſtarve France, manifeſted in the treaties of England with Ruſſia, Pruſſia, Spain, and other powers; diſplayed that this ſyſtem of exterminating France, and blotting her from the map of Europe, was a regular deeply digeſted, and uniform ſyſtem; that the atrocity of the deſign was only the more odious, ſince the imbecility that dictated it muſt bring down a retaliation of ſyſtem on itſelf; diſgraced at Toulon and Dunkirk, they meditated new corruption; that the Engliſh miniſters were at that moment employed in the moſt diabolical efforts, open and ſecret againſt France, that the latter ſhould in due time be diſcloſed, but that it was neceſſary to keep the knowledge which the committee poſſeſſed ſecret, in order to render the efforts of the enemy more completely deſtructive to themſelves; he proceeded with great animation in an appeal to the paſſions—England he ſaid was capable of outraging humanity in every ſhape, of every crime towards the republic and towards all nations whom ſhe could not cajole or corrupt and render ſubſervient to her avarice and ambition—ſhe attacks the rights of nations with the ſame audacity that ſhe had enſlaved her own people and attempted to enſlave Europe; ſhe dreads the eſtabliſhment of liberty in France as fatal to her uſurpations, and ſhe wiſhes to annihilate it; ſhe wiſhes to make the deſpots of Europe her allies, in order that the corruption of her government may be guaranteed—How long will the republic ſuffer to continue on her frontier the ſlaves of the ideot George—the ſoldiers of the moſt ſtupid and atrocious of tyrants? He who was diſappointed in America wiſhes to renew his hopes on that country by the deſtruction of the power now republicaniſed which tore from his talons the republic of the new world. He who formed the Congreſs of Pilnitz, and bribed and ſeduced, degraded and then betrayed, both his own promiſes and the objects of his deſigns; he who maſſacred the republicans in the neutral ports of Genoa; he who corrupted the cities and endeavoured to deſtroy the national repreſentatives—he who expended millions to create a league of all Europe, to ſtarve the French people for the crime of ſeeking their liberties—he who purchaſed treaſons in every direction, and diſſeminates forged papers in France for which he daily ſigns death warrants againſt his own impoveriſhed and corrupted ſubjects! What is the mode of proceeding ſuitable to the atrocities of ſuch a monſter and ſuch a government? Are the forms of civilized war to be obſerved towards tygers and bears? Are miſcreants who contemn all moral and civil obligations, and put men fighting for their freedom out of the pale of civilization, are they to be treated as civilized men? Are the republicans of France to indure, an inſidious exterminating war, and not retaliate? No! forbid it juſtice; "When the events of battle ſhall put in your power either Engliſh or Hanoverians, bring to your memory, ſoldiers of liberty, all thoſe acts perpetrated againſt you—recollect all the wrongs and hatreds you unmeritedly ſuffer—the vaſt tracts of country laid waſte by the hired ſlaves of England. Carry your eyes to La Vendee, Lyons, Toulon, Landrecy, Martinique, and St. Domingo, places ſtill reeking with the blood which the atrocious policy of England has ſhed. Do not truſt to their artful language, that affected bluntneſs which hides a dark, ſelfiſh, and tyrannical ſoul—a language worthy of their perfidious character and machiavelian government. Thoſe who boaſt that they abhor the tyranny of George, ſay can they fight for him? No!—no, republican ſoldiers:—you ought therefore when victory ſhall put into your power either Engliſhmen or Hanoverians, to ſtrike; not one of them ought to return to the traitorous territory of England, or be brought into France. Let the Britiſh ſlaves periſh, and Europe be free."

This meaſure the effect of repeated aggravation, produced an enthuſiaſm that raiſed the French armies to the utmoſt pitch of hatred; and ſtruck a terror ſo fatal into the hearts of the enemy, that in almoſt every ſucceeding action, the Britiſh and Hanoverian troops could ſcarcely be brought to rally if their ranks were once broken. A decree was paſſed in a few days after upon the ſpirit of this propoſition of Barrere, that if the garriſons of Valenciennes, Condé, and Queſnoy did not ſurrender within twenty-four hours after being ſummoned, they ſhould not be ſpared; thoſe garriſons ſurrendered without making that reſiſtance which under other circumſtances they might.

Robeſpierre whoſe power had been daily elevating to the higheſt and moſt unlimited extent, did not perceive, that beneath his feet the very means by which he had poſſeſſed himſelf of it, were alſo, working a mine that was to annihilate him by a ſudden and momentary exploſion. What hath been obſerved by naturaliſts of the encreaſed ferocity of thoſe animals, which have once taſted of human blood, may be applied to the chief of ſavages, man, when he has once diſcarded humanity and become intoxicated with power. The priſons of Paris were ſtill crowded with victims from all parts of the country, in conſequence of that decree which rendered all priſoners of a certain claſs to be tried by the revolutionary tribunal only. At one period they amounted to between ſeven and eight thouſand. No preciſe return has been publiſhed of the trials; the newſpapers French and Engliſh have been the ſources of many errors on this ſubject, and have conſigned to death many victims who never exiſted.* A few names, however, diſtinguiſhed hy their celebrity deſerve notice. Lamoignon Maleſherbes, the generous defender of Louis, was one of thoſe, his principles need no better teſt than his connection with the great Turgot, with whom he entered into adminiſtration, and in whoſe diſmiſſion he had been joined under the miſtaken and capricious rule of that unfortunate king. His virtues were an affliction to the heart of Robeſpierre, and he periſhed. The eccentric baron Trenck, he whoſe life had been an uninterrupted courſe of ſuffering from the ingenious cruelty of deſpotiſm, was doomed at length to fall by a tyranny more dreadful, even when he had conſoled himſelf with the reflection of obtaining the goal of freedom. The princeſs Lumbomirſka, a Ruſſian lady whoſe devotion to liberty had led her from the banks of the Viſtula to participate in the brilliant carreer of the revolution, was alſo proſcribed by the tyrant, the celebrated Koſciuſko had humanely interpoſed his venerable voice to atteſt her virtues and her devotion to freedom, but with that black ſpecies of ambition, which, like pope Sixtus the Fifth and the Engliſh Elizabeth, could revel with the intoxication of delight upon the murder of female beauty and innocence united in a princeſs, ſhe was marked down for death by the ſanguinary tyrant. Among the proſcribed whom the better genuis of liberty preſerved, was Thomas Paine, whoſe luminous writings ſo much contributed to the eſtabliſhment of union and independence on the ſhores of America; by a ſingular, but yet unaccounted for, perverſion of all reaſoning, the tyrant had marked him down for execution, as neceſſary to the "common good of America and France;" a critical fever had ſeized him, and as if the monſter could not enjoy his murders unleſs the victim were ſuſceptible of the painful circumſtances of his ſtate, his execution was ſuſpended until he ſhould be reſtored to health. Meanwhile the tyrant's fate was decided. But ere that auſpicious event, the priſoners ſuffered all the miſeries of want and apprehenſion. Impriſonment became more ſtrict, they were prohihited from receiving proviſions by their families or from taverns, but compelled to eat out of one diſh and at one table; they were reſtricted to a ſcanty meal in twenty-four hours, and the expence of each priſoner was to be fifty ſous a day.

* The Engliſh newſpapers dwelt with lengthened horrors on the execution of the widow of the Bailie Suffrien, whoſe naval ſerivces has reflected ſo much credit on France. The ignorance of the author of this execution defeated his malignity, by giving in the title of Bailie, which is a ſuperior honorary diſtinction of the order of Knights of Malta, an evidence of the falſehood; becauſe the Knights of that order by their vows are bound to celibacy, and Suffrein conſequently could have no wife or widow.

Men in power rarely diſcern the foundations upon which it reſts. The alarm created by the denunciations of Brunſwick, the artifices of England, and the treachery of men purchaſed by her gold; had led the people of France to ſubmit patiently to any evils leſs grevious, than ſubjection by their wanton and inveterate enemies, or the ſwords of foreign mercenaries. While their country was menaced, the ſufferings of individuals were only conſidered as leſſer calamities. But in proportion as the arms of the republic became triumphant, as plots were defeated, and the enemy chaſed from the frontiers of the republic; apprehenſion of external danger were removed, and people began to feel and think of their ſituation at home. The ſigh long ſmothered was lengthened into a murmur, and the moans of miſery excited a keen but dumb ſympathy. The recollection of the many virtuous men who had paſſed acroſs the ſtage to the bourne of death, made the heart of the generous and the tender throb with revolt; and the death of Danton and Camille, thoſe men whoſe great minds and firm patriotiſm had compreſſed the revolution into the compaſs of a few ſhort years, daily preſented to the reflection an exceſs of tyranny, which was too dangerous for all to be tolerable for any.

The fate of Danton had excited a degree or horror in the members of the convention with a very few exceptions. His death was viſibly a ſacrifice to the jealouſy of ambition, and thoſe who before dreaded the ambition of Danton, ſaw when too late how much more grevious was that tyranny under which they had fallen. The members of the committees were each anticipating a ſimilar fate, and ſatisfied, that to be ſucceſsful the country muſt be relieved from the bondage in which the minds of thoſe were enthralled who held the poſts of truſt and action; with Robeſpierre and thoſe devoted to him, there could be no confidence, becauſe fidelity to be permanent muſt be reciprocal.

Barrere whoſe verſatile capacity foreſaw intuitively every danger from the colliſion of party and every advantage that the revolution could obtain from improving the current of popular fear, paſſion, or reſentment, appears to have been the author of a conſpiracy exactly correſponding with that of Danton. Profiting by the fall of Danton, and poſſeſſing an addreſs more flexible and inſinuating, more perſuaſive, and leſs ſevere; he had contrived to obtain an exact knowledge of the temper and thoughts of the two committees, individually, and found that the greater number were like himſelf, inſpired with abhorrence of the ſtate of ſubjection in which they were held. Among men ſo circumſtanced, the diſcloſure of ſentiments is the bond of attachment, and a plan was agreed upon, which was to guide the meaſures of the conſpirators. The temper of the public mind was not yet entirely awakened to the identity of the public misfortunes, they ſaw not ſufficiently clear that in Robeſpierre was concentred the very origin and vital principle of the pervading calamities; they reſolved to order public meaſures ſo that the ſource ſhould be ſeen, and it was left to the courſe of events to unfold him to the public eye in ſuch a form as would afford them a fit opportunity to rouſe the public indignation, and by falling upon him at once extricate the country and themſelves from their afflictions; beſides the members of the committees, conſiſting chiefly of Billaud, Barrere, Carnot, and Lindet others were united in ſimilar views ſeveral of the earneſt friends of all the parties that had been proſcribed; Tallien, Legendre, Bourdon of the Oiſe, Freron, and many of thoſe of the Gironde who had remained in a ſtate of negative exiſtence ſince the fall of their friends.

A report was preſented on the ſeventh of June from the committee of finance, upon the ſubject of an extraordinary contribution; Cambon was at the head of that committee, and from him the great meaſures of finance that had ſupplied the vaſt wants of the revolution uſually iſſued.

Robeſpierre ſpoke of this man's plans with comtempt; he called them little, fraudulent, and mean; the members of the committee heard him with ſilent indignation; all but Cambon, who lifted up his voice and had the courage firſt to break through that reſtraint which had ſo long chained the minds of the convention in ſervile obedience to whatever meaſure the tyrant ſignified an attachment; he had been entruſted with the purpoſes of the conſpirators, but his wounded pride as an author, his official vanity as a financier, could not ſuffer him to reſtrain himſelf at a moment when all others thought the time not yet ripe for his undoing; he upbraided him with bitterneſs and with anger, Robeſpierre, whoſe name was ſynonimous with terror, was aſtoniſhed, and even condeſcended to aſſure Cambon, that his reflections were only of a general nature, and not intended to inſult or injure him. It was now viſible to all that the period approached when they ſhould ſtrike.

On the ninth of June, the convention had been, in the recently uſual ſilent way, led to paſs a decree which inveſted the committees with a power of conveying before the revolutionary tribunal all perſons who ſhould be deemed to have incurred the penalties of the national juſtice. On the next day Bourdon of the Oiſe took upon him to cenſure that decree, in the moſt pointed terms. "Does this right," ſaid he, "extend to the members of the convention? Can they order the national repreſentatives allo before that tribunal?" He was anſwered only by murmurs. "I love thoſe conſolatory murmurs," exclaimed he, with a warmth of enthuſiaſm that made the hall reſound—"I love thoſe "conſolatory murmurs, by which I am ſatisfied that liberty can never periſh! I love "thoſe murmurs, becauſe they declare to me that you did not mean to confer on the " committees a power with which they ought not to be entruſted, and which they ſhould " not accept, if you were ſo baſe. I move that you formally pronounce, that the com- " mittees ſhall ſtill preſerve the ſalutary right of apprehending, whenever the ſafety of " the republic ſhall require it, the repreſentatives of the people; but, that they ſhall not " be authoriſed to bring them before the revolutionary tribunal without a previous decree " of this aſſembly."

A diviſion on this queſtion was called for. A member obſerved that ſuch an idea could not poſſibly have been conceived, as that of giving ſuch a power to the committee. "But," added he, " as the decree in queſtion abrogates all preceding laws, I demand that the propoſition of Bourdon be adopted.

Merlin of Douay propoſed to decree that the national repreſentation had an excluſive right to paſs decrees againſt its own members, and to have them tried before the criminal tribunals. This he thought an unalienable right. It was decreed.

On the eleventh of June, Couthon made a further report on the organization of the revolutionary tribunal; Bourdon and Lecointre moved an adjournment. Robeſpierre oppoſed it—" I obſerve," ſaid he, " that the period when liberty triumphs moſt, is that in which the enemies of the people are moſt active to deprive us of the fruits of our labours. We conſent to die, but we wiſh the country and the convention to be ſaved." On the twelfth Couthon attempted once more to revive the ſubject of the former diſcuſſion, and wiſhed to exonerate the committee from the charge of ambition and wiſhing to accumulate exorbitant powers; he named Bourdon as a perſon wiſhing to diſtract the convention; and ſaid the reſolution paſſed concerning the Committees' power was equally injurious to them and the convention.

Bourdon ſaid he would not permit ſuch inſinuations of bad intentions to paſs unrepelled. —He argued at large to ſhew it was dictated by the pureſt intentions, and to produce the beſt effects. Robeſpierre thereupon roſe and in a very long ſpeech attacked Bourdon; he ſaid, that after the overthrow of Briſſot, other conſpiracies had been ſecretly formed, " elſe why thoſe attempts to divide the committees from the mountain? The mountain the convention, and the committees are the ſame, [loud plaudits.] Behold then a project of intrigue in this diſtinction; therefore there are intriguers"—" Name them!" Exclaimed Bourdon. " I will not name any perſon, for the intriguers diſcover themſelves [applauſe,] one fact will tend to prove there are people who wiſh to divide us. Two couriers belonging to the committee were yeſterday in the ſtreets addreſſed in theſe words, " what do you do there? You are two of the twenty thouſand ſpies of the com- " mittee"! He concluded with a hope that the convention would reſtore its confidence to the committees.

Tallien obſerved reſpecting the couriers, that five perſons came up to him and two of his colleagues, and forced themſelves into their company with a view to join in their converſation, while walking the terrace; but not a word paſſed concerning ſpies. Robeſpierre aſſerted that three hundred perſons witneſſed it, and that it was odious to add falſhood to crimes.

The convention did not appear to receive the declamations of Robeſpierre with their uſual promptitude; the effort he now made was viſibly intended to enable him to graſp at the lives of thoſe he feared.

This ſudden check to the authority of Robeſpierre was ſeverely felt; and whether diſtruſtful of his aſſociates or meditating ſome further plan of proſcription and maſſacre, he abſented himſelf for four decades (forty days) from the committees, under pretence of indiſpiſition; nevertheleſs during this period he directed the whole adminiſtration of the interior police which he had retained excluſively to himſelf, unleſs occaſionally he entruſted ſome meaſures to be executed by Couthon or St. Juſt, who were indefatigable in his ſervice, and diſplayed an attachment to him to the laſt worthy of a better cauſe.

During the period of his abſence, however, no viſible change took place in the order of affairs; Robeſpierre received his daily liſts of the priſoners, and he marked on the margin, as cuſtomary, a croſs oppoſite the names of thoſe who were to be tried, which was ſynonimous with executed.

During the remainder of the month of June, a variety of important decrees were paſſed; literary inſtitutions were eſtabliſhed, and other highly laudable and uſeful plans adopted. Reports of victories were daily brought in, and diſplayed by the florid and inexhauſtible eloquence of Barrere. On the eighteenth of June he preſented a report from the committee of public ſafety on the means of preventing mendicity; by which beggars were directed to be removed from the bridges and other highways; they were to be decently clothed, temporary relief afforded till houſes could be provided, and afterwards each was to be employed in ſuch labour as their reſpective ages and infirmities would enable them to perform. By another decree proviſion was made for the ſubſiſtence of the indigent blind.

Some regulations were alſo made in the early part of July reſpecting prizes and captures; and very judicious meaſures were adopted to prevent the circulation of forged aſſignats, with which England in particular contrived to inundate the republic, and in which as was before noticed, the combined powers all concurred. From ſuch a diſgraceful mode of war, honeſty ſhrinks; if the private forger is a felon, as Barrere obſerved, what appellation ſhall be given to the crowned felon who commits the deed himſelf, and with the ſame hand ſigns the death warrant of the indigent criminal. If ſuch a meaſure could effect the governmentof a country hoſtile to the happineſs of mankind, as the French was alledged to be, ſome excuſe might be found perhaps in that pretended but abſurd code called the "laws of war;" but unfortunately it is the humble and innocent individual upon whom it preys; it is the honeſt and unſuſpecting labourer that ſuffers, who finds himſelf and his family defrauded by royal ſharpers, of that pittance which he had earned with the ſweat of his brow—it is a fraud upon the widow and the orphan! and yet who have been diſtinguiſhed for committing it—the ſupporters and aſſertors of the religion of Chriſt! By a report of St. Juſt it appeared that notwithſtanding the millions that had been ſecretly ſent into France, not more than to the nominal value of one hundred and thirty thouſand livres had been impoſed on the national treaſury, (about ſix thouſand pounds ſterling).

On the joint report of the committees of ſafety and war, the convention adopted a mode of diſtributing military preferments. In every corps, one third of the poſts, from the rank of ſub-lieutenant to that of chief of battalion or ſquadron were devoted to the recompenſe of ſuch of the defenders of their country as diſtinguiſhed themſelves by heroical exploits. The remaining two thirds to be beſtowed by ſeniority or election. Thus the firſt poſt vacant in the corps was to be filled up in the order of ſeniority, the ſecond by election, and in the third caſe the vacancy was to be ſupplied by order of the convention by ſome perſon who had diſtinguiſhed himſelf in action. A liſt of all the latter claſs was to be made out every decade and diſtributed throughout the armies.

The wiſdom of ſuch a plan is in itſelf evident, from its equity, and the effect which it muſt neceſſarily produce by the emulation of talents and valour.

While theſe wiſe decrees were paſſing, the armies of the republic were purſuing their triumphs, and the meaſures of the republic were conducted with a vigor which had completely refuted a long received notion, that popular governments were incapable of energy and diſpatch. At the ſame moment the ſtorm was ſecretly collecting which was to terminate at once the fate of the tyrant, his ſanguinary ſyſtem, and gradually alter the whole revolutionary proceſs to a regular and orderly repreſentative government. Yet to ſhake the well eſtabliſhed power of Robeſpierre, was a bold enterprize. The Jacobin club that ſource of power and popularity from the commencement of the revolution, was ſtill at his devotion: the armed force of Paris was ſecured by the agency of Henriot the commandant; the revolutionary tribunal and all the offices of truſt were filled with perſons of his choice; he held an undivided control over the national police; and although his influence with the populace had ſuffered, it was not annihilated, ſince it had not fixed on any other character. His tyranny was of a peculiar caſt; it was not ſupported as deſpotiſm uſually is, by the oppreſſion of the poorer claſſes of ſociety; but it was directed principally againſt the affluent and the learned; as he roſe in power by the blind attachment of the multitude, ſo he never neglected any occaſion to flatter their deſires and conciliate their paſſions.

Man is not naturally ſavage or ferocious; but he is capable of being rendered both; the conduct of the combined powers was in itſelf ſo much diſtinguiſhed by both characters, that it was not ſurpriſing that rage and deſpair ſhould have converted the French people into beings as furious as their threatened dangers were terrific. This prediſpoſition of the people when Robeſpierre obtained an aſcendancy, was calculated to render his firſt proſcriptions leſs odious; but when danger was removed to a greater diſtance, and proſcription became ſo general as to exempt neither age, ſex, nor condition, ſelf-preſervation muſt have excited an alarm, that could not fail of ſettling in diſguſt or hatred. Thoſe who conſpired againſt Robeſpierre muſt have been ſenſible of the great prevalency of ſuch ſentiments. But it alſo appears that beſide the party which was formed in the committees, there was another acting independently in the convention, theſe were the decided friends of Danton, at whoſe head was Legendre, and this party was by far the moſt formidable. As the lenity of Brutus in ſparing Antony, after having ſacrificed Cæſar, is ſaid to have proved the ruin of his party; the ſacrifice of Danton and ſuffering Legendre to ſurvive him, may be ſaid to have precipitated his fall. The moſt inveterate enemies of Robeſpierre were thoſe who had ſtood by his ſide ſo long on the mountain, and it was with Legendre that Tallien and Bourdon united.

The uſurper was not inſenſible of his danger. He only imagined it to be not ſo great, or more remote. He appears to have repoſed no confidence in the committee of public ſafety, although it is equally evident that he did not ſuſpect danger ſo generally from that quarter. Notwithſtanding his abſence from the committee, he attended the Jacobins on the firſt of July, where he pronounced along harangue in his own defence. He complained that he was the object of foreign perſecution, that calumnies of the ſame nature appeared againſthim in the papers paid by Pitt in London and Paris; he ſpoke of a plot to overthrow the republic, and reprobated the moderates, whom he conſidered as in a conſpiracy with the enemies of the nation.

The reports to which he alluded were actually publiſhed in ſeveral journals, and imported that he had formed a new liſt of thirty members of the convention whom he meant to ſend to the ſcaffold; that he meant to proclaim himſelf dictator; and that the whole authority of the nation was to be veſted in the triumvirate Robeſpierre, St. Juſt, and Couthon. That he formed ſome deſign of proſcription may be clearly inferred from the meaſures propoſed concerning the power of arreſt; that the reſt of the charge was medi. tated is not either ſo certain or probable. His ſucceſs had been ſo great in frequently defeating his adverſaries, however, that even this unuſal freedom of the preſs with him ſeems not to have weakened his confidence. On the eleventh of July his brother denounced Dubois Crance in the Jacobin club, and on the fifteenth he appeared there in perſon to denounce a counter-revolutionary committee which he reported, actually exiſted in the republic.

The parties in the convention had not yet acted with all that concert which appeared neceſſary; and remained even on the twenty-third of July without any fixed plan or any external marks of confidence in each other. On this day we find Barrere making a flaming report on five victories obtained by the armies of the republic, in Piedmont, the Weſtern Pyrennees, on the Rhine and Belgium. On the next day he made a further report, on the ſtate of the capital, wherein he urges the convention to beware of conſpiracies, and to place renewed confidence in their government—"In the midſt of victories," ſaid he, "which ſucceed each other like the exploſion after lightning, we ought to be on our guard againſt the evil genius of our enemies, who are forming a party even in our boſom with as much addreſs as activity." On the twenty-fifth he delivered another report on the ſame ſubject; after ſtating that liberty would annihilate the authors of the new plot, he entered into a reply to thoſe miſled citizens who wiſhed for another 31ſt of May. This alluded to an addreſs preſented that morning by the Jacobins, denouncing what they called the party of ſtrangers. He then entered into a compariſon of the paſt with the then preſent ſtate of the republic, and with ſingular felicity expoſed the afflictions of faction, in a manner which while it appeared to favour the ſentiments of Robeſpierre, expoſed his meaſures with a degree of nakedneſs that could be miſtaken only by the infatuation of guilt.

The hopes of the uſurper appear to have reſted wholly at this time on the energy, popularity, and attachment of the Jacobins, and he entertained the idea through them of once more overawing the convention. His brother and other agents had conſtantly reproached the Jacobins with their torpor. On preſenting their addreſs on the twenty-fifth Dubois Crance, who had been denounced in the club by the younger Robeſpierre, took occaſion to juſtify himſelf againſt their aſperſions and calumnies; but the convention entered ſo little into the ſpirit of theſe factious brawls, that after much tumult, the addreſs was referred to the committee of public ſafety.

On the twenty-ſixth Robeſpierre appeared in the convention; he mounted the tribune, and announced his intention to make a report on his own authority of the ſtate of the republic—"Is it true" he ſaid "that alarm hath been infuſed into the minds of the national repreſentatives to ſuch a degree, that ſeveral of them are afraid to ſleep at their own houſes? Is it true that I am accuſed of wiſhing to march to the dictatorſhip over the enſanguined ruins of the national repreſentation? This word Dictatorſhip, reviles the revolutionary government; it deſtroys the republic and renders the national juſtice odious, depicting it as a ſervile inſtrument to one man who directs its operations at pleaſure. What a terrible uſe have our enemies made of a word, which at Rome was applied only to a public function! May I be permitted to return to the duke of York the patent of this dignity, which his friends have made out for me? The cowards! They call me a tyrant: If indeed I were one they would crouch at my feet—If I were one, do you think that tyrants would perſecute me with ſuch virulence? No—they would be prodigal of aſſiſtance to me. Tyrants arrive at the deſtined goal by the aid of ſcoundrels: have thoſe who combat tyrants the ſame object in view?—Truth undoubtedly is deſpotic; but falſhood can no more imitate this deſpotiſm than Salmoneus could imitate thunder. Would you know the ſource of theſe atrocious accuſations brought againſt me? Here is the ſource in the papers of a conſpirator, to whom the ſcaffold has at length done juſtice. "If this cunning demagogue," he ſays, ſpeaking of me, "had never exiſted, the nation would be free, the mind would be unfettered, and we ſhould not have ſeen thoſe aſſaſſinations known by the appellation of the ſentences of the revolutionary tribunal! Would you know the authors of theſe calumnies? In the firſt rank move the duke of York, Mr. Pitt, and his agents. Who come afterwards?—I cannot prevail upon myſelf to remove the veil which conceals ſuch iniquity; but among them are contained thoſe men who oppoſed the decree by which atheiſm was deſtroyed.

"For four decades I have been forced to renounce thoſe functions which you confided to me; but I have never ceaſed to watch over the public weal. I have ſeen that the Engliſh ſo abuſed in our ſpeeches, have not been treated with rigor on the frontiers, and that the decree againſt them has not in one inſtance been carried into effect.

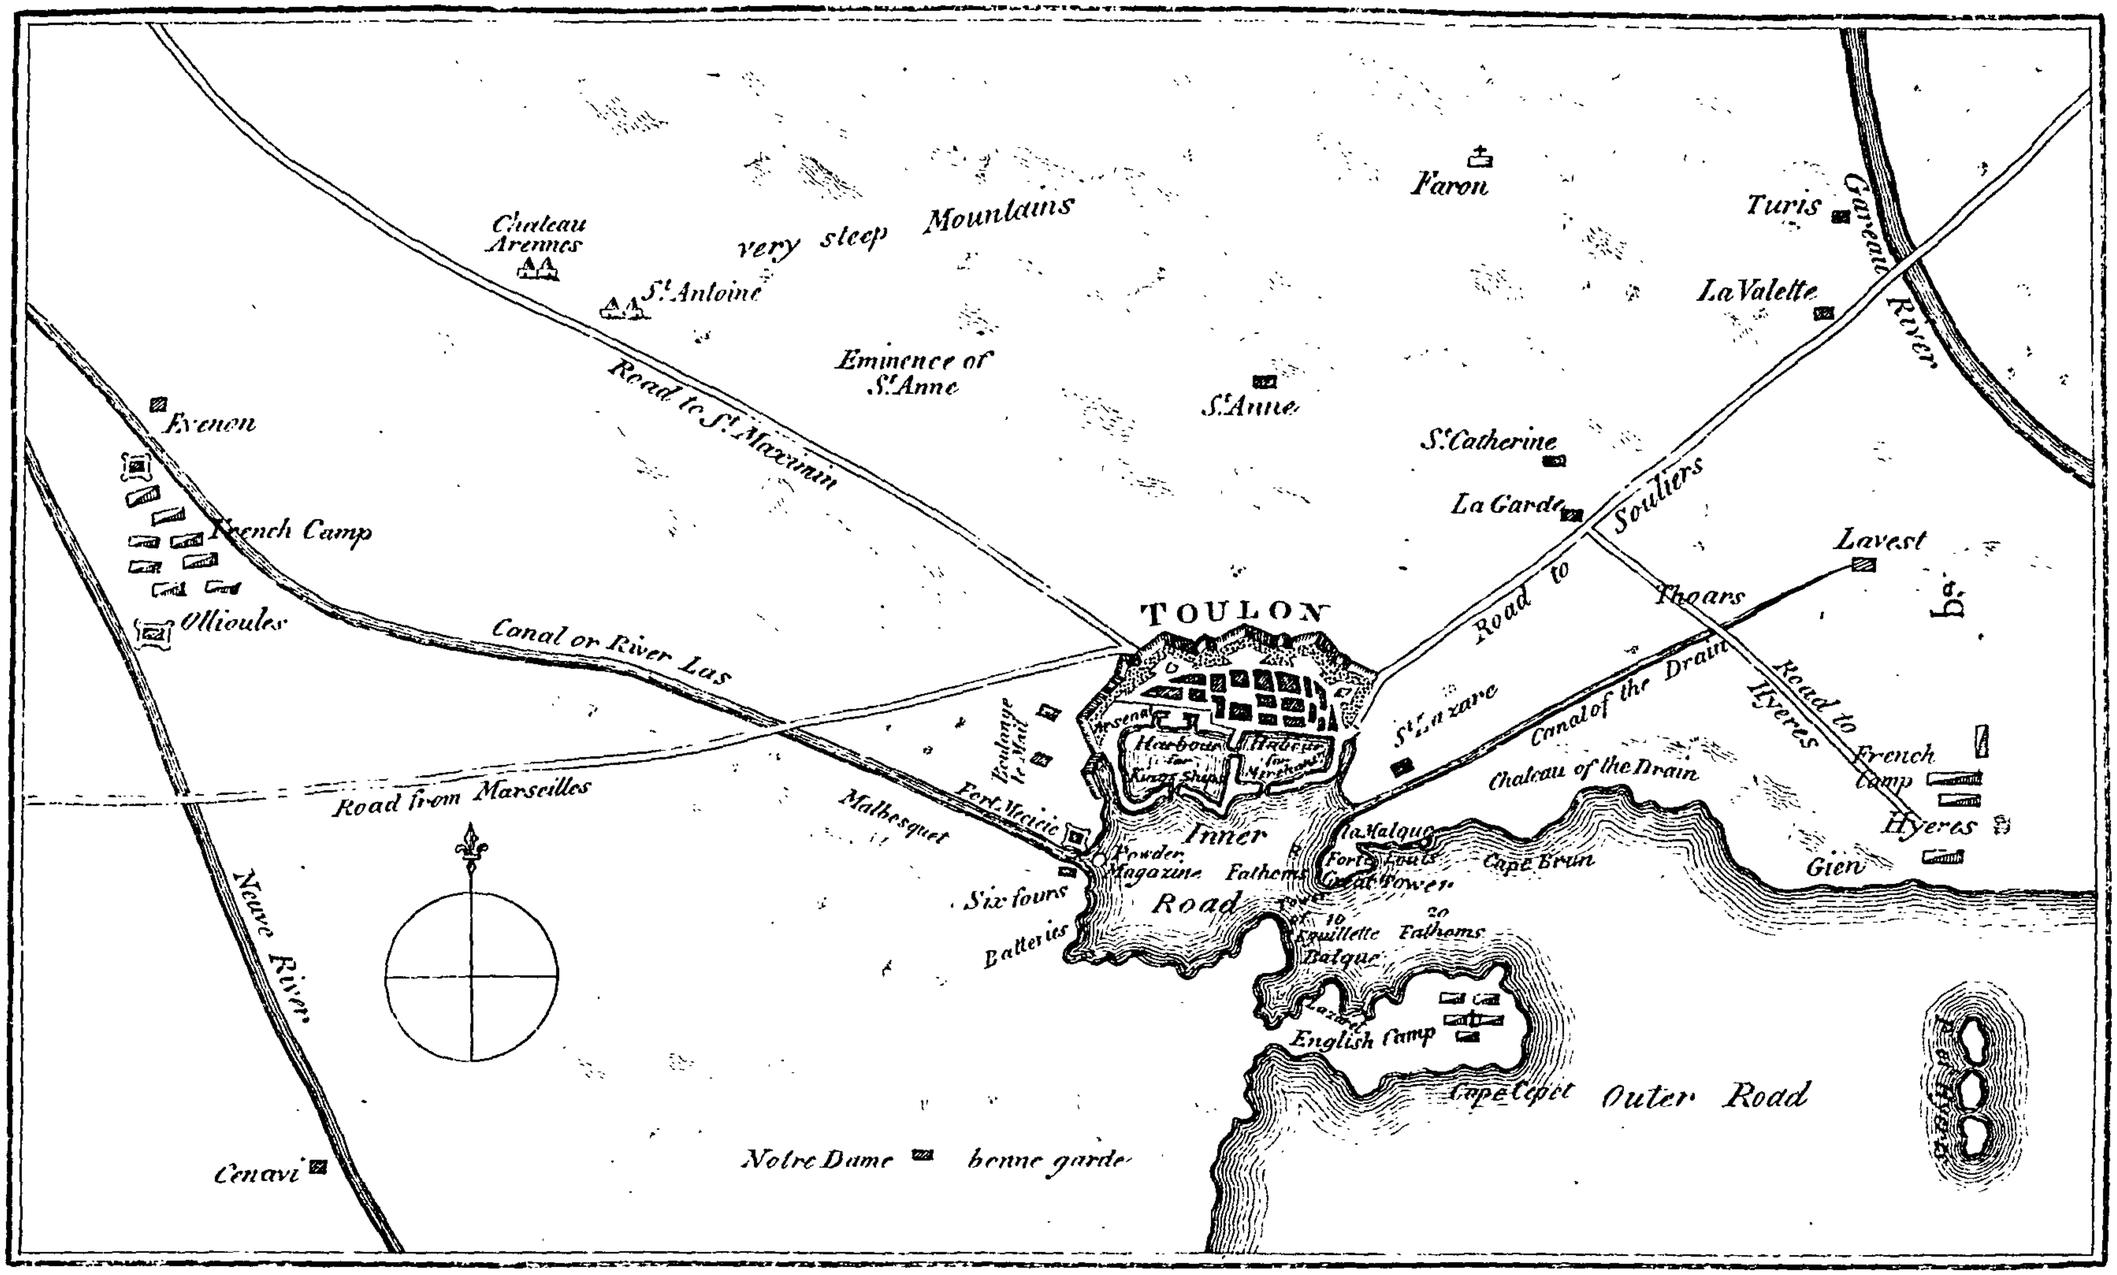
"I am aſtoniſhed at that academical levity with which our victories are ſometimes ſpoken of; as if they were gained without any loſs to our brave defenders—I warn you that attempts are made to amuſe you by planting in Belgium the ſterile tree of liberty inſtead of gathering in the harveſt of victory. Without doubt your committees contain the firm ſupporters of liberty, but the majority is paralyſed. Concealment and diſſimulation are practiſed, and conſpiracy rears her head. The artillery has been ſent from Paris. Attempts are made to obtain poſſeſſion of every thing; and conſpiracy, I repeat it, rears her head.

"I have thus diſcloſed to you truths, which, though diſagreeable to particular perſons, are neceſſary to be known, and in ſo doing I have been influenced by no other deſire than that of ſerving my country. It is neceſſary that the committees ſhould act, but it is likewiſe neceſſary to ſuperintend their operations. It is incumbent on the convention to aſſume the dignity which belongs to its character."

As it was uſual to move in the convention for the printing of remarkable ſpeeches, it was expected that ſuch a motion would be made; but Bourdon roſe with promptneſs and ſaid—"I demand that this ſpeech be referred to the committees of public ſafety and general ſecurity, in order that they may examine its contents previous to its being printed; on the ground that, in all probability ſome errors may have crept into the juſt ſtatements that have juſt now been made."—Barrere roſe next—"And I alſo duly eſtimate the privileges of a French citizen. In a free country every thing ought to be known."

Couthon expreſſed himſelf in very ſtrong terms in favour of the immediate printing without any reference—"For a long time calumny has raiſed its tongue againſt the ancient pillars of the revolution." Vadier and Cambon ſupported Bourdon's propoſition;

the latter renewed his obſervations on the freſh attack made in this ſpeech on the financial ſyſtem. Robeſpierre was overwhelmed with this reiterated attack—he aſcended the tribune and ſaid—"I ſpoke of the ſyſtem alone, and, without being very profound in financial knowlege, one may readily perceive that a great number of indigent citizens are ruined by it." The hall became now very much agitated, Freron ſtemmed the tumult, and was heard—"The moment when liberty is to be revived, is that when the freedom of opinion is re-eſtabliſhed. I demand that the convention reſcind the decree which gave to the committees the power of apprehending the members of the convention. [Applauſes.] Where is the man who can dare to ſpeak with freedom when he dreads arreſt?" Billaud Varennes—"Should the propoſition now made be adopted, the convention will undergo a ſhocking degradation. He, who is prevented by dread from ſpeaking his ſentiments, is not worthy to be a repreſentative of the people." Panis declared that "if Freron's propoſition was not adopted liberty could not exiſt."



From this oppoſition of the party in the convention and the party in the committees to each other, it is clear there was no concert between them; but it had alſo this particular advantage, that the uſurper was thereby more confident in his ſecurity, which the deciſion of the convention ſtill further ſanctioned, as the ſpeech after a lengthy and violent debate was ordered to be printed without any reference.

The chief reliance of Robeſpierre appears now to have been on his coadjutors St. Juſt and Couthon, and on his own capacity to awake the paſſions and direct them; new combinations formed on the preſſure of the moment had always ſerved his ends, and he was prepared to ſeize upon them. But the moment of his confuſion was approaching, and he whoſe policy had been ſo long wary and profound in the moment of difficulty, acted with the raſhneſs of youth, and the imprudence of a novice. His ſpeech of this day was perhaps the moſt feeble of any he had delivered from the tribune, and as it was a ſtudied ſpeech, for the outline of it was found ſubſequently among his papers in his own handwriting, there is reaſon to believe, upon comparing it with many others of his ſpeeches, which are ably arranged and of a very vigorous and eloquent character, that he had different authors at his command. Every thing was vague and irrelevant on this occaſion, it was a whining complaint to his friends, not the language that was to overawe intrepid rivals—even the attempt to inſinuate a charge againſt his adverſaries, under the affectation of candor on his removing the veil, was a viſible effect of cowardice, or an acknowlegement that he had fallen from his uſual aſcendancy. He ſpoke like a man terrified by the number of his enemies, to perſons impatient to rouſe the vengeance of France againſt him. He diſcovered his fears to a jealous confederacy, willing to increaſe his panic, to aggravate his fears, and to cruſh him beneath them; and while thus making ſignals of diſtreſs, he pointed out without daring to name them, the perſons of whom he deſired to be revenged, who were even in that circumſtance learning from himſelf, that caution, which was ſo long indiſpenſible to their ſecurity againſt his power, was now no longer neceſſary.—Accordingly they did not leave him time to meditate plans of vengeance; the deputies moſt expoſed to his fury met together in the night, they were ſatisfied of the preſſure of their danger, and that on the morrow they muſt deſtroy, or be deſtroyed.—

That morrow was the memorable ninth of Thermidor; (the twenty-ſeventh of July,) a day juſtly celebrated in the French revolution. After ſome petitions had been heard,

St. Juſt appeared at the tribune, and ſaid, "I am of no faction, I will contend againſt them all—your committees of public and general ſafety, have cauſed me to make a report on the cauſes of the evident perverſion of public opinion; but I mean to addreſs myſelf to you, and only in my own name"—A burſt of general clamour compelled the orator to conclude, he was entering into a ſpeech in ſupport of what had fallen from Robeſpierre on the preceding day. After ſome tumult, a member of great intrepidity, a bold and energetic character, Tallien, obtained a hearing; he ſpoke to order, "The laſt ſpeaker commenced with telling you that he is of no party;—good;—I likewiſe eſpouſe only the ſide of truth. But we muſt draw alſo the veil that encircles our misfortunes:—Yeſterday a member of the government preſented you a report upon theſtate of the republic, and he very plainly told you it was upon his own authority:—To-day another member comes, and he tells you he is authorized to make a report by the committees which you have appointed, and he tells you that he will not diſcharge that duty, but that he alſo will ſpeak to you and report only in his own name! What good citizen can refrain from lamenting with tears the abject and calamitous ſtate to which the republic is reduced, when individuals thus pretend not only to diſpenſe with the public truſt given in charge to them, by this aſſembly, but to dictate to you in their own name, and upon their own authority!" The aſſembly applauded, and was ſome moments in a ſtate of ferment. Billaud Varennes mounted the tribune, and profound ſilence prevailed—"Yeſterday the club of the Jacobins was filled with villains and apoſtates; every perſon was admitted who came. An intention was there intimated of murdering ſeverel members of this aſſembly. [Loud murmurs] Yeſterday I heard men utter the moſt abominable calumnies againſt thoſe who had never deviated from the revolution. I ſee one of thoſe wretches now ſitting on the mountain who uſed the expreſſions [a loud cry of 'arreſt him,' it was Le Bas, he was arreſted.] The moment is arrived when truth muſt out; I wonder that St. Juſt ſhould ſpeak at the tribune after what has paſſed. He had promiſed to ſhew his ſpeech to the committee before he ſhould ſpeak it here. The aſſembly will do wrong if it does not perceive that it is in the hands of two murderers. If it is weak and irreſolute it will immediately periſh! ['No! no!' cried a majority of members and ſpontaneouſly riſing moved their hats.—The galleries reſounded with like cries, and ſhouted out 'long live the convention! live the committee of public ſafety!'— Le Bas deſired to be heard—It was moved that he be ſent to priſon.] Billaud continued—"You will ſhudder with horror when you are apprized that the armed force of Paris is intruſted to parricidal hands. Henriot was denounced by the revolutionary tribunal as an accomplice with Hebert. What was the conſequence? One man alone had the audacity to ſupport him. Need I name who that individual was?---Robeſpierre. Lavalette, one of the chiefs of the armed force, the only noble who has been retained in a military truſt, ſharpens the poignards intended to inflict a fatal blow upon the repreſentatives of the people:—under whoſe auſpices has he been protected?—Robeſpierre's. I might quote many more proofs of the ſame audacity on the part of Robeſpierre, and of his infamous deſigns againſt liberty—among others, I need only mention that he has been the author of the impriſonment of the members of the revolutionary committee of the ſection of Indiviſibility—men of the moſt unſullied integrity, and of the moſt diſtinguiſhed patriotiſm; I accuſe him of having withdrawn himſelf from the committee for theſe four laſt decades, ſince the decree with reſpect to the revolutionary tribunal paſſed on the twentyſecond of Prairial (June 10,) which he alone deviſed—and which was badly received. Thus he intended to drive from the convention every impure man; that is to ſay, every perſon who did not pleaſe him, or whom he might ſuſpect to be poſſeſſed of ſufficient diſcernment to detect, and integrity to oppoſe, his ambitious views; and as a preparatory ſtep to eſtabliſh himſelf in that dictatorſhip, which has ſo long been the object of his wiſhes, he would have left none in the convention but his creatures and dependants, men as vile as himſelf, and ready to forward his deteſtable views. But his deſigns were diſcovered by the very means which he took to carry them into execution. From the facts which I have briefly ſtated, his intentions to corrupt the military, to enſlave and to degrade the repreſentation, appear plain and incontrovertible.

SKETCH of the HARBOUR and ENVIRONS of TOULON.

T. Clarke Sculpt.

"I think I ſpeak the voice of the convention, when I ſay, there is not a repreſentative who would exiſt under a tyrant!--['No! no!—let tyrants periſh,' was the cry from all parts of the hall.] Men who are always ſpeaking of their own virtues and probity, are thoſe who trample theſe qualities under foot. Are more facts ſtill neceſſary to ſubſtantiate his general criminality? I accuſe him of having ſkreened from juſtice a ſecretary who had robbed the treaſury of one hundred and fourteen thouſand livres; ſuch is the foundation on which ſtand his pretenſions to diſintereſtedneſs, which were only aſſumed in order to conceal the deep laid projects of his ambition, and to deceive thoſe whom he afterwards meant to deſtroy or enſlave. I accuſe him with being ſurrounded by a band of ruffians, among whom it is neceſſary only to mention the infamous Daubigny. With all his affectation of probity, ſuch were the aſſociates whom alone he could admit into his confidence, or truſt for the completion of his deſigns. I could account to you, citizens, a thouſand other ſimilar facts of this man; and yet it is he who dares to accuſe us; we who ſpend our nights and days in the committee of public ſafety in organizing our victories. I proclaim the tyranny of Robeſpierre! [Loud and repeated burſts of applauſe reſounded from all parts of the hall.]

We muſt not heſitate to fall on him with the hand of juſtice, or ſuffer our country to be manured with our blood and tyranny to triumph. It was his wiſh to mutilate the convention, and to murder the repreſentatives of the nation—again I proclaim the tyranny of Robeſpierre! [The applauſes were renewed.]

Robeſpierre darted towards the tribune, he attempted to ſpeak---the hall was filled with the acclamations of 'down with the tyrant,' and he found himſelf obliged to deſiſt, and to deſcend in confuſion.

Tallien aſcended---"I juſt now obſerved that we muſt withdraw the veil. I now ſee with pleaſure that it is completely drawn aſide, and the cauſe of all our afflictions is become viſible; that the conſpirators are unmaſked, and that they will be annihilated [loud applauſes,] Every thing ſpeaks that the enemy of the national repreſentation is about to fall! In the houſe of that guilty individual who now ſtands humbled with the conſciouſneſs of detected guilt, and overwhelmed with that diſapprobation which his infamous deſigns againſt liberty have ſo juſtly merited, were formed thoſe liſts of proſcription which have ſtained with ſo much blood the altars of riſing liberty; imitating the example of the deteſtable Sylla, his proſcriptions were intended only to pave the way for his own power, and the eſtabliſhment of a perpetual dictatorſhip: happily however his deſigns have been diſcovered before he had time to execute them, or to add to that ſtream of blood which has already deluged France. His long ſucceſs in villainy made him at laſt lay aſide his wonted caution. He advanced with ſuch rapidity in the career of lawleſs ambition, that he already conceived himſelf arrived at the accompliſhment of his wiſhes; and that, like Cæſar, the name of king was only wanting to him, for the full eſtabliſhment of his power. Was it to ſubject ourſelves to ſo degrading, and ſo abject a tyranny, that we brought to the ſcaffold the laſt of the Capets, and laviſhed ſo much blood of French citizens? Was it in order to acknowledge ſo petty a deſpot, that we declared eternal war againſt kings, and ſwore to eſtabliſh liberty at the price of life? No—the ſpirit of freedom has not ſunk ſo low; the ſenſe of that duty which virtuous men owe to their country is not extinguiſhed. I invoke the ſhade of the virtuous Brutus! [fixing his eyes on the buſt.] Like him, I have a poignard to rid my country of the tyrant, if the convention do not deliver him to the ſword of juſtice! The French people, always juſt, are attached neither to Robeſpierre, nor any other individual—Liberty is alone the object of their affections, and whoever forms any deſigns againſt it, becomes that moment their enemy. That liberty they will ever purſue amidſt the intrigues of domeſtic traitors, and the oppoſition of foreign deſpots. The republic is to be eſtabliſhed not only by the victories of our armies, but by the vigilance of our councils, and the juſtneſs of our puniſhments. After the enumeration of facts which you have heard from the laſt ſpeaker, it is only neceſſary for me to remind you of the proceedings of that ſitting of the Jacobins, where Dumas, preſident of the revolutionary tribunal, the creature and confederate of Robeſpierre, had the audacity to inſult the repreſentatives of the people? Need I recall to you the expreſſion addreſſed to the journaliſts in one of the laſt ſittings of the Jacobins? "I prohibit you from inſerting my diſcourſes in your papers till you have previouſly communicated them to me." Here already we find the tone of the dictator---the people ſhall know nothing except through my organ, and in the manner in which I ſhall be pleaſed to communicate it to them.

"Let us, republicans, accuſe this uſurper with loyalty and courage in the preſence of the French people and of Europe. It is fit to enlighten our fellow citizens, liberty is alone the object of their affections. It is not an individual whom I attack, it is a vaſt conſpiracy. I doubt not but the convention will take ſpeedy and efficacious meaſures, and continue its ſittings permanent, to ſave the people; and as it is of the utmoſt importance that the chiefs of the armed force ſhould do no miſchief, I move that Henriot and all his ſtaff be arreſted. It is our wiſh that the preſident of the revolutionary-tribunal ſhould treat the accuſed with decency and juſtice. This is true virtue. I alſo move that our ſitting be permanent until the ſword of the law has ſecured to us this revolution. [It was decreed with applauſe.] Well ought the uſurper count upon the aid of ſilence and deception, whoſe deſigns were too infamous to be revealed, and whoſe conduct required to be gloſſed over with all the artifice of hypocriſy. But the French people are not to be enſlaved after having ſhaken off the tyranny of ſo many ages, and the ſtill greater tyranny that till this moment threatened to overwhelm us for ever. The guilt of the traitor now ſtands revealed, and it remains only to think of his puniſhment. I move therefore that Robeſpierre and his creatures be immediately arreſted. [Reiterated applauſes].

Billaud—"I denounce as accomplices of the conſpirator, Boulanger, the author of the liſt of perſons marked out for proſcription; Dufreſne, who was the accomplice of Dumourier; Dumas, who excited the Jacobins yeſterday to maſſacre the convention; Lavalette ex-noble, one of the commanders of the Pariſian armed force; Daubigny and Si-jas; it was decreed. Tallien, Freron, Delmas, Eli-Lacoſte, Vadier, and ſeveral other members ſpoke, and by ſucceſſive votes, Robeſpierre the elder and younger, St. Juſt, Couthon, and Le Bas, were all, along with the others named, placed under arreſt. The applauſes from the galleries and all parts of the hall were unuſually great, and joy and gladneſs were once more viſible on the countenances of the members and of the people.

The convention now called upon Barrere to ſpeak in the name of the committee of public ſafety, which he did with great animation, repreſenting the critical circumſtances in which the committee was placed between the powers uſurped over the public force and the popular mind, and their neceſſary duty; and he concluded with propoſing the following decree:—"The national convention on the report of the committee of public ſafety and general ſecurity, decrees—1. That all ranks ſuperior to that of chief of a legion are ſuppreſſed in Paris. The national-guard ſhall reſume its original organization, and each chief of a legion ſhall in conſequence command in turn. 2. The mayor of Paris, the national agent, and he who ſhall be in his turn the commandant of the national-guard, ſhall watch over the ſafety of the national repreſentation, and ſhall anſwer with their heads for all the commotions which ſhall enſue in Paris. The preſent decree ſhall be immediately ſent to the mayor."

Barrere then ſaid that ever ſince the tenth of June, and not before, he had diſcerned the views of that cunning man, whom he could not ſince look upon without horror; he who deceived every body, who had ſacrificed not only his creatures but his friends, who had at one time defended and afterwards betrayed Camille Deſmoulins, and who by his artifices made men without their ſuſpecting it the accomplices of his crimes. He had framed a reſolution and a decree for remodelling the revolutionary tribunal in ſuch a manner as to render his ſacrifices more ſure; he framed it himſelf and Couthon propoſed it even without reading it.

Robeſpierre endeavoured to make himſelf heard, and Couthon and Le Bas ſought for leave to defend him; but neither would be ſuffered.

When the decree of arreſt was paſſed the preſident of the convention, ordered one of the uſhers to take Robeſpierre into cuſtody, but ſuch was the awe this man had been accuſtomed to inſpire, that the officer heſitated ſome time to perform his duty. They were conducted however by a few peace officers to the priſon of the Luxembourg; but the adminiſtrator of the police on duty there refuſed to receive them; and they were conducted rather in triumph than as priſoners to the Hotel de Ville.

The committee of public ſafety in the mean time had inveſted Barras, a military man member of the convention, and afterwards a Director, with the command of the military force; and he had arreſted Henriot, who however contrived to eſcape, and with the alacrity of deſparation had collected a great number of his adherents, at the head of whom he ſallied into the ſtreets, and meeting Merlin of Thionville ſeized him as an hoſtage for the ſafety of Robeſpierre, and carried him to a guard-houſe. Merlin harangued the people, and ſhewed the inſult to the national repreſentation, five gendarms who heard him drew their ſwords, reſcued him and took Henriot and ſome of his adherents. But Henriot eſcaped again, and entered the ſquare of the national palace, where he harangued the populace. He was outlawed by the convention. Six members were united with Barras as commiſſioners with uulimited powers; they were Ferrand, Freron, Rouvere, Delmas, Leonard Bourdon, and Bourdon of the Oiſe.

Meanwhile Henriot's inſurgents became numerous; and he divided them with ſkill; one was detached to the Hotel de Ville, another to the committee of public ſafety, and the third paraded near the convention; he had the alarm-bells rung, the Jacobins and the municipality aſſembled and declared themſelves in a ſtate of iuſurrection; and the party of Robeſpierre in the Hotel de Ville formed themſelves into a new convention, declaring the repreſentatives traitors.

In this dangerons criſis the citizens of Paris, who had been hitherto depreſſed by terror or overcome by indolence, perceived their danger, and recollected what had befallen Paris by their indifference on the memorable ſecond of September. They armed and flew to the convention. The report of Robeſpierre's eſcape through the infidelity of the municipal officers reached the convention. A proclamation was iſſued putting him and his accomplices out of the protection of the laws. The national-guard was now rallied; a party of the inſurgents aſſembled and attempted to force the poſts in the Carouſel with cannon; they were attacked, diſcomfited, and their leader made priſoner. In the evening the ſections of Paris appeared at the bar, and ſwore to acknowlege no authority but the convention. But it was not till between two and three oclock in the morning that Barras had poſſeſſed himſelf of ſufficient force to attack the traitors in the Hotel de Ville. At that hour Bourdon of the Oiſe appeared at the Place de Grave, and read the proclamation. He then ruſhed into the hall of the inſurgent committee, armed with a ſabre and piſtols; the traitors were completely deſerted, Robeſpierre had armed himſelf with a large knife, which was wreſted from him by a gendarm, who ſtruck Couthon with it; who was alſo armed with a knife. Robeſpierre ſnatched a piſtol and attempted to ſhoot himſelf by putting the muzzle in his mouth, he ſhot away his tongue and part of his jaw, but did not kill himſelf; he received a ſabre wound from a perſon who attempted to cut down the piſtol arm. The younger Robeſpierre threw himſelf out of a window, and broke a leg and an arm. Le Bas ſhot himſelf, Couthon ſtabbed himſelf twice without effecting his death. Henriot from one of the windows harangued the ſoldiers and endeavoured to call them to the aſſiſtance of his aſſociates; Coffinthal, a member of the municipality, who had been ſeduced into the inſurrection by Henriot, at the deſire of ſome perſons below threw the miſcreant out of the window, and his arm was broken but he was not killed. Robeſpierre was carried on a litter to the door of the convention, it was aſked if he ſhould be admitted, the preſident ſaid "No! the carcaſe of the tyrant can bring only peſtilence. The ſquare of the revolution is the only place for him and his accomplices." They were immediately brought before the revolutionary tribunal.

In the evening Legendre reported to the convention as follows—"As I went from this tribune I took with me ten reſolute patriots, my intention was to go and blow out the brains of the man who preſided yeſterday and to day in the Jacobin club. With a double-barrel piſtol I entered the hall, but the wretch whoſe name is Vivier, mixed with the crowd. I ſaid to the women in the galleries,--'you are miſled; begone! the convention puniſhes guilt not error!'---I ſhut the gates of the hall; and here are the keys: As the convention in a maſs has ſaved the country, the convention in a maſs will to morrow be Jacobins: It will be virtue that will go once more to open the gates of that ſociety ſo baſely polluted for ſome time." At ſix in the morning the ſitting was ſuſpended; and they met again at nine.

The perſons of the uſurper and his ſatellites being identified before the rovolutionary tribunal, and ſome papers found upon Robeſpierre produced, they were condemned to

to ſuffer death in the place de la Revolution, and a few ſhort hours after he periſhed upon that ſcaffold to which he had ſent ſo many innocent victims. The perſons who ſuffered on this occaſion were Maximilian Robeſpierre, aged thirty-five, born at Arras; George Couthon, aged thirty-eight, born at Orſai; A. St. Juſt, twenty-ſix years, born at Ciſere; A. Robeſpierre, the younger, aged twenty-nine; F. Henriot, thirty-three; L. Lavalette, forty years, ex-noble, born at Paris; R. Dumas, thirty-ſeven, at Cuſſi, preſident of the revolutionary tribunal; J. R. Leſcot-Fluriot, thirty-nine, mayor of Paris. They were conveyed from the palace of juſtice at ſeven in the evening of the 28th July, and never was ſo great a concourſe aſſembled, never was joy and tranſport ſo general on a melancholy occaſion. In all the ſtreets through which they paſſed, and in the ſquare of the revolution, unanimous cries of "Ah! villians! Live the republic! Live the convention!" were heard. The eyes of the ſpectators were particularly fixed on the elder Robeſpierre, Couthon, and Henriot, whoſe faces were covered with blood and wounds.

Couthon was executed firſt, then the younger Robeſpierre and Henriot; Robeſpierre was executed the laſt but one. He ſtood two minutes on the ſcaffold, while the executioner removed the cloth which covered his face. It is to be regretted that he whoſe voice had been the organ of ſo much evil, ſhould have been rendered ſpeechleſs by his wound. It would have been deſirable to hear in the preſence of death what his ferocious ſpirit would utter; but the den was cloſed, and we know only the actions and cruelty of the monſter without any means of diſcovering whether a ſoul ſo fell was capable of contrition.

Maximilian Robeſpierre, whoſe paſſions appear to have ſuperceded all morals and virtues, to have extinguiſhed every feeling of humanity, every emotion of benevolence, arrived at an height of power by means ſo terrible as to enſure him a place in hiſtory along with the deſtroyers and aſſaſſins of mankind. Illuſtrious for his crimes he will have the diſtinction, upon which his dark ſoul appears to have been ſet, of a detailed hiſtory; and while names of the virtuous and good who fell the victims of his rapacious thirſt of power, are paſſed over in ſolemn negligence, the character of this human fiend will be traced to his cradle and examined with the ſcrupulous nicety of critical wiſdom.

He and his brother were born at Arras, and left orphans at an early age. The biſhop of that dioceſe had taken them under his protection, and beſtowed upon them a liberal education; he was bred up with a view to the profeſſion of the law, and in the courſe of his ſtudies had gained ſeveral literary prizes; at the age of ſixteen elated by this ſucceſs, he fancied himſelf already endowed with ſuch rare powers of genius as would lead him to a ſplendid place on the great theatre of the world. His legal ſtudies were purſued without equal ſucceſs, but with no leſs confidence, and he already imagined himſelf diſputing the palm of eloquence with the firſt men of the age. He muſt ſee Paris, his beniſicent patron removed him thither; but after a long and fruitleſs trial, he was under the neceſſity of recalling him to his native city, where all the ſplended dreams of ambition and vanity were reduced to the ſituation of a poor obſcure attorney, a ſtation which was well ſuited to the mediocrity of his talents.

There are circumſtances in the phyſical conſtitution of the body, as well as in the accidental progreſſion of human life, which form and determine the character. Under different circumſtances the ſame man would be a different character. The loſs of a leg or an eye, the delay of the revolution for ten years, would have ſunk Robeſpierre into the common obſcurity of an undiſtinguiſhed name; he might have brooded over his diſappointments in circumſcribed bounds, and vented his malignity in the mercenary oppreſſions of a petty-fogger. From the period of his return from Paris, his mind brooded in abhorrence over his diſappointments; and he who had placed his loftieſt hopes on the ſtrength of his endowments and talents, became the implacable perſecutor of genius. His petulance and acerbity were prominent in all his legal undertakings. He ſeemed to repine at his exiſtence, and carried irraſcibility into the moſt trivial of the cauſes with which he was entruſted. His habit of body gradually obtained a correſponding character with his mind: in perſon he was of a low ſtature, not more than five feet three inches; in his early years he was ruddy and round; in his manhood, he became meagre, his features harſh and forbidding, his eye ſcowled, and his complexion was livid and cadaverous; he was ſo atrabilarious, that he appeared to ſtruggle between the diſeaſe of his mind and body—as if nature had expoſed the fountains of genius and glory to his ſight, and excited a thirſt which he was doomed never to allay; diſappointment and envy took poſſeſſion of his ſoul, and he ſoon learned to quench his burning ſpirit in the blood of the good, the wiſe, the virtuous, and the innocent.

The revolution forced him from his deſk. He was elected a deputy in 1789. And for a while his character ſlumbered in inſignificance; having an unhoped for glimpſe of repoſe after the long fatigues of diſappointment. In the conſtituent aſſembly, he was ſcarcely heard of, and had he died during that period, his name would not have ſurvived him; but his ſubſequent conduct recalled attention to what he had then ſaid or done. He was regarded as the fixed friend of monarchy. In July 1792, he publiſhed a pamphlet entitled —"Repreſentative government and the forms of monarchy, the only conſtitutional arrangements proper for an empire ſo extenſive and ancient as France." He was at this time an obſcure and inconſequent attendant at the ſplendid dinners of Orleans, and he has been ſaid, though without any appearance of proof, to have endeavoured to procure the elevation of that perſon to the throne. The brilliant talents of Mirabeau appear to have fixed his attention; ſome faint efforts at imitation of that great orator, are diſcernable in his ſpeeches at a latter period, but he never was able to obtain his ſtrength, promptitude, ſublimity, or dignity. Yet he appears to have equalled if not ſurpaſſed Mirabeau in the talent for intrigue.

By the ſelf-denying ordinance of the conſtituent aſſembly, Robeſpierre loſt his ſeat in the legiſlature. He accepted the place of public accuſer, but reſigned it ſoon after; having by his induſtrious artifices obtained an aſcendancy in the commune of Paris, that already preſented hopes conſolatory to his ambitious deſires. In the affair of the tenth of Auguſt he had no concern whatever; and although he narrowly eſcaped the ſcaffold through the candor and juſtice of Danton upon the denunciation of Louvet, who accuſed him of fomenting the maſſacres of the ſecond of September, he muſt be acquitted of having cauſed that maſſacre, although there is much reaſon to believe with Louvet that he encouraged and ſupported thoſe who were the actors in it, with a view to ſecure his own popularity.

He was elected into the convention by the city of Paris along with his brother, and ſome others, by his influence; but even at this time, active and aſſiduous as he was to cultivate the attachment of the Jacobins, he defended royalty againſt Briſſot. His politics, however, ſoon after changed, and with the death of the king he became as violent a defender of republicaniſm; the cant of empire and anceſtry, were ſuperceded by that of unity and indiviſibility. His ambition appears not to have been ſo extenſive at this as at a ſubſequent period; but after the fall of the Gironde, the black envy and rancour of the Arras attorney appears to have been relighted in the breaſt of the conſpiring uſurper—Power and ambition had now ſupplanted the paſſion for literary and forenſic fame; he once more recollected with aggravated hatred his paſt diſappointments. Men of genuis and literary diſtinction, whom he once hoped to emulate, and to be ranked among them, were now the moſt formidable obſtacles to his darling hopes. He held them up as perſons hoſtile to the cauſe of liberty, and labored inceſſantly to render them the objects of popular ſuſpicion; he thus flattered the ignorant, gained their attachment, and rendered the ariſtocracy of talents as formidable to the vulgar conception, as the ariſtocracy of vice and prejudice. This ſyſtem of his was not the effect of premeditation, but accomodated at the moment to his views; thoſe whom he feared or hated becauſe they were honoured and reſpected, were men who blended the philoſophy of ſcience with their ethics, and endeavoured to render them ſubſervient to the promotion of each other. Theſe men Robeſpierre ſtigmatiſed with the name of ſtateſmen, which he did not mean to be underſtood in its received ſignification; in his vocabulary it meant counter-revolutioniſt or conſpirator. Briſſot in his ſpeech for an appeal to the people on the trial of the king, pourtrayed this ſyſtem of Robeſpierre with a felicity that incurred the mortal and incurable hatred of thoſe whom it deſcribed. 'The ignorance of the multitude is the maſter-ſpring of the power of anarchiſts as well as of deſpots; it is by this they keep alive the breath of calumny. Furniſhed with this engine, they make war on philoſophy, which teaches us that univerſal reaſon is the only baſis of liberty; and thus deride every plan of education, and deny the utility of public ſchools. Theſe are reveries, ſay they; the people muſt be regenerated with blood. This is the reaſon why they are inveighing ſo continually againſt the ariſtocracy of genuis. Alas! why has knowledge only a metaphyſical exiſtence? With what complacency would not theſe Vandals bring it to their own level, if their deſtroying ſcythe could reach it.' Though it is unfortunately too true, that men favoured by education are as prone to exceſſes as the moſt ignorant, it is alſo true that the courſe of violence with the latter is more explicit and not ſo univerſally fatal; with the former cunning and ſtratagem take place of force; Robeſpierre could not be claſſed with the ignorant, yet his diſappointment at being excluded from the claſs of genuis, had thrown him back to the level of the moſt barbarous. No one has yet completely unveiled the ſecrets of his mind, the vaſt and ſanguinary ſcope of his ambition; his views and hopes can only be gueſſed at, and perhaps it will be no more than juſt to conſider him as a preternatural being, with whoſe actions and deſigns from the moſt intimate ſtudy and obſervation, the mind of man cannot enter into affinity. His character can only be drawn by the features that are viſible, and theſe are altogether hideous, notwithſtanding the wonderful power of his diſſimulation.

ROBESPIERRE.

He appears to have deſired to be the firſt man in France, without regard to the means; but the numberleſs men of genuis which France contained was an inſuperable bar to his ambition. He calculated upon their entire deſtruction or ſuppreſſion; and it was in the moment when the people were in a ſtate of convulſion, when it was neceſſary to ſooth and bring back their minds to order and moderation, that he ſeized upon the whirlwind and directed the ſtorm. He who had never been a republican from principle, from conviction, or from reaſoning—under the pretence of the moſt zealous attachment to freedom became the moſt horrible of tyrants. In the moment when the reſtraint of law was moſt neceſſary, he broke down the barriers of all reſtraint but that of his will. Once arrived at the ſummit of credit and power, he left no hope for the monſters of any age to ſurpaſs him. As if jealous even of crimes, or eager that they ſhould emanate from himſelf alone, he diſcouraged every villain that was not dependent on him, and obliged them to keep in a ſubordinate rank, to be no more than journeymen murderers and incendiaries.

The fermentation of the public mind was favourable to his purpoſes; and the real danger of the country rendered his ſecret machinations eaſily diſguiſable under the pretence of ſecurity againſt treachery. The convention was neceſſary to his views, and he contrived to render it ſubſervient; by turns he intimidated, ſeduced, and deceived them; ſometimes he ſowed the moſt deadly diſtruſt, and then he reſtored tranquillity; ſhewing reſpect when they were docile, and contempt when they manifeſted an independent diſpoſition; he acted the ſervant of the law, while he violated every principle of juſtice; and profeſſed obedience to the general will, while he domineered over every ſuffrage and enſlaved every voice; when he invoked liberty, then it was that freedom was menaced; if he talked of God and morality, it was but the prelude to crimes.

Robeſpierre has been compared to the Engliſh Cromwell. There appears to be a cloſer reſemblance between them than any other two monſters of which hiſtory records. The interior caſt of their minds was in moſt reſpects the ſame. There is ſome difference in the circumſtances of their early lives and ſubſequent elevation. Both indeed were the creatures of accident. Cromwell negociated with Charles I. even during his captivity. Robeſpierre was a royaliſt even after the tenth of Auguſt. The proſpect of ſovereign authority was gradually unfolded to each by a ſeries of favourable circumſtances, of which each had the courage to take advantage. Both were deſtitute of ſympathy and affection. Both were remorſeleſs and ſanguinary. The difference of their murders was the effect of their ſituations and profeſſions. Robeſpierre's ſcene of action was the capital and the ſenate, he ſlaughtered without diſcrimination and without mercy on the ſcaffold, in the provinces his agents were commended only as they equalled or ſurpaſſed him in crimes. Cromwell did not ſacrifice ſo many in the capital, but in the field and in the provinces his butcheries even ſurpaſs thoſe of Robeſpierre, whether conſidered for number or the lengthened agony of his tortures. Robeſpierre ordered Lyons to be raſed from its foundations. Cromwell ordered the people of a whole province to be ſlaughtered, in order that the inhabitants of another province might be tranſplanted thither, and it was done. Both affected ſimplicity in their manners and appearance; both were adepts in hypocriſy, cunning, and intrigue. Cromwell adopted his harangues to the jargon of the enthuſiaſts of his day; Robeſpierre did the ſame; the name of God, and virtue, and religion prefaced and concluded all their meaſures and ſpeeches. The only difference in their hypocriſy aroſe from the ſcene of action and the characters among which they acted.

The parallel might be traced to a multitude of points. The difference was very ſmall. Cromwell's power was founded upon a great military reputation, which he had acquired, not from his gallantry againſt a diſciplined enemy, but from the numbers he had ſlaughtered of ſimple, innocent, and oppreſſed men, acting by the impulſe of nature, to procure freedom without any knowledge of the arts neceſſary to oppoſe diſciplined troops; it was alſo founded on the fanatical hatred inſpired by contending religious ſects, which rendered the very circumſtance of deſtroying one ſect, the foundation of glory in that day. Robeſpierre reſted on a fluctuating populace, and a fanatical club. The murders of Cromwell were remote, and committed on two deſpiſed and ſubjugated nations. Robeſpierre's were committed on his countrymen, openly, and glaringly. Hence it is that one died on his bed, the other on the ſcaffold. Cromwell appears to have been his own miniſter, Robeſpierre made others the ladders of his ambition. Cromwell ſeems to have founded ſome good laws, and in many reſpects to have conſulted the happineſs of his countrymen. Robeſpierre does not appear to have founded one. The great meaſures produced under his uſurpation were forced on him by ſtealth or intrigue, and ſuffered only becauſe they ſerved to ſhade his enormities, practiſed by inferior agents. Thus he made philoſophers and ſtateſmen the inſtruments of his fame and aſſaſſins the inſtruments of his vengeance, for a long time all the talents of Danton, Barrere, Camille, Fabre, Sieyes, Carnot, Delaunay, Cambon, and the Lindets, were loſt in the power of Robeſpierre, while at the ſame time Chaumette, Hebert, Carrier, Vincent, Momoro, Marat, Collot, Couthon, Henriot, Lebon, and St. Juſt were ſpreading terror and deſolation to eſtabliſh that power.

When the former became too conſpicuous they were proſcribed. When the latter had accompliſhed their ends and were no longer uſeful, they were dangerous depoſitaries of his meaſures, and it was neceſſary to paſs them acroſs the ſame ſtage over which they had led ſo many victims. The readineſs with which he abandoned his earlieſt and moſt intimate aſſociates, for friends he could not be conſidered to have any, is aſtoniſhing and characteriſtic of his whole carreer; placed on the ſame ſide with him, Danton, a man of a determined character, inflexible in republican principles, and who had the merit of being the firſt propoſer of the republic in France, a man of impetuous eloquence, and wonderful energy of character, who was foremoſt on all occaſions when danger threatened and to propoſe meaſures the moſt ſublime and energetic; he went to the aſſault better than Robeſpierre, but he was alive to every paſſion approachable by ſenſibility; Robeſpierre obeyed but one and was callous to all others; thus while Danton was liable to be aſſailed on the ſcore of generoſity, of tenderneſs, of honor, and compaſſion, and his ardour for the promotion of liberty; Robeſpierre was awakened to ambition alone. They were ſeldom ſeen in oppoſition to each other in the convention, but the mere rivalry of reputation was with Robeſpierre a fault inexpiable. Danton was not ignorant of this, and this ſaying of his has been preſerved, "Every thing will be well while the people cry Robeſpierre and Dan-"ton, but woe to me ſhould they ever cry Danton and Robeſpierre." That day arrived, and he was put to death. Even the aſſociates of his early years, Camille Deſmoulines, his ſchool-fellow, was the victim of his perfidious deſertion; he had with the moſt benevolent intentions employed his great talents and learning on a weekly Journal, by means of which he endeavoured to moderate inſenſibly the rage of the people and to turn them aſide from ſanguinary meaſures, and before he had begun this generous courſe of writing, had aſſured himſelf of the ſpecial concurrence and approbation of the tyrant;—but an outcry was raiſed, and Camille's wit as well as the purity of his life, were ſevere rebukes upon the dullneſs and crimes of Robeſpierre, and notwithſtanding their early connection Camille was ſacrificed.

Heaven was wearied with his crimes, and his fall aſtoniſhed by its rapidity even thoſe who had ſtudied his plans the moſt attentively and were placed neareſt to his intrigues. The myſtery of his ambition will never be perfectly underſtood; it may be doubted if he ever poſſeſſed a confident, entruſted with his final intentions; his ſoul dwelt in ſolitude, and the receſſes of his conſcience ſeem to have been illuminated only by the torch of the furies, and by the gloomy flaſhings of their pale flames. The part he took for ſix weeks before his fall while he abſented himſelf from the ſitting of the committee of public ſafety, cannot be ſatisfactorily explained. He was indeed preſent there by Couthon, and St. Juſt, two men wholly devoted to him. There appears reaſon to believe however, that his abſence was connected with ſome immenſe plan of maſſacre or deſpotiſm. The period muſt have appeared to him not very remote when the people would no longer endure proſcriptions and executions without remorſe and without end, and that a general exploſion on the ſide of patriotic juſtice, would annihilate the tyranny and the tyrant. Could he have blindly conceived the audacious hope of overthrowing the power of the committee of public ſafety, as he had undermined the convention; and by their deſtruction remove the only appearance that remained of a co-diſtinction above the nation. It is remarkable that during the ſix weeks of his abſence the executions were doubled. But he did not ceaſe all this period to direct the ſecret operations of the police. It is difficult to imagine how he could diſplay ſo little prudence, in his plan of attack; how he could ſuffer it to be penetrated before he had ſecured its progreſs by preparation, by well concerted diſpoſitions. —He was confuſed by the rapidity of the aſſault; and this rapidity was itſelf determined by the circumſtances of the moment. He was overthrown when the conteſt was ſcarcely begun. It was not thus that he conducted himſelf to overthrow the Girondiſts. Circumſpect and prudent movements had preceded the proſcription of the 31ſt of May, 1793—In 1794, he relied too much upon the terror he had inſpired; he miſcalculated the ſuccours he expected from the municipality and the Jacobins. At a moment that every thing bent before him, and that he had arrived at the arrogance of reſtricting his ſpeeches from being publiſhed until he had ſanctioned them by a peruſal, he was on the verge of deſtruction—Providence when it will ſport with thoſe coloſſuſes of pride, overwhelms them with a breath, and points out to weak man the folly of proſtrating themſelves before an idol of their own creation.

The municipal officers and others, who excited the inſurrection in favour of Robeſpierre were tried on the thirtieth of July, and between ſixty and ſeventy of them ſuffered death. The vacancies in the committee of public ſafety were filled up by Eſchaſſeriaux the elder, Tallien, Thuriot, Breard, Laloi, and Trielhard, the following old members being retained, Carnot, Collot, Barrere, Billaud, Lindet, and Prieur; the laſt of theſe and Jean Bon St. Andre were ſent on miſſion by Robeſpierre, with a view to obtain full power in the committee, the other five however adhered cloſely to each other, and having the majority over Robeſpierre, Couthon and St. Juſt, had not only the means of ſecuring their immediate ſafety, but of forming that conſpiracy which overthrew the uſurper.

It was alſo regulated that one fourth of the committee ſhould go out in rotation monthly. On the thirtieth Barras who had been appointed to the command of the armed force reſigned his appointment, ſignifying that as tranquillity was perfectly reſtored his powers were no longer neceſſary. Congratulations poured in from all parts of the republic on the events of the ninth of Thermidor, and from all the armies.

Moderation with very little exception now henceforward characteriſed the convention; and conformably to this diſpoſition they proceeded to diſſolve and new-model the revolutionary tribunal. The priſons were alſo opened in ſucceſſion, and the caſes of different priſoners examined by commiſſioners. On the firſt of Auguſt the indefatigable Barrere preſented a new plan of government, to exiſt until a conſtitution ſhould be regularly formed, digeſted, and voted; and on the fifth his propoſition was moulded into a decree which was as follows:---

I. The committee of public ſafety ſhall aſſume the name of "The central committee of government." It ſhall be compoſed of twelve members, to be renewed every month, and not eligible again till after the interval of a month.

II. This committee ſhall be under the direct inſpection of the "commiſſion of foreign affairs," and cannot diſpoſe of any of the public funds except for the ſecret ſervices of government. For this purpoſe it ſhall have upon the national treaſury a credit of ten millions. The credit which it had formerly, and is hitherto unemployed, is hereby withdrawn.

III. The committee of ſurety and ſuperintendance ſhall take the name of "The committee of general police of the republic." It ſhall conſiſt of fifteen members: it ſhall, independently of the convention, have alone the power of arreſting citizens. For iſſuing warrants of arreſt againſt public functionaries, it ſhall act in concert with the committee charged with the ſuperintendance of the adminiſtration to which ſuch functionary may belong.

IV. It ſhall neither ſend to trial thoſe who have been arreſted, nor liberate thoſe ſentenced by the popular commiſſions, without being in concert with the central committee of government.

V. The commiſſion of civil affairs, of police, and the tribunals, ſhall make to it a daily report of the police and interior ſecurity of the republic.

VI. It ſhall have, under its immediate inſpection, the police and armed force of Paris, the revolutionary tribunal, the committees of ſuperintendancce of the republic, and the popular commiſſions.

VII. The national treaſury ſhall credit it for nine hundred thouſand livres, for extraordinary and ſecret expences.

VIII. A fifth part of the members of the committee ſhall be changed every month, and not re-eligible for the interval of one month.

IX. All other committees, or commiſſions of the convention, now in exiſtence, are aboliſhed.

X. The following twelve committees ſhall be eſtabliſhed:

1. One to ſuperintend the commiſſion of agriculture and arts, compoſed of five members.---2. One of public inſtruction, of five members.---3. Of commerce and proviſions, five members.---4. Of tranſports, poſt-offices, and poſt-houſes, five members.---5. Of arms and powder, ſix members.---6. Of the movements of the armies, ſix members.---7. Of the marine and colonies, five members.---8. Of public ſuccour, five members.---9. Of public works, five members.---10. For the ſuperintendance of the public expences and revenues, there ſhall be four ſections. The firſt, conſiſting of five members, ſhall ſuperintend the commiſſion of the public treaſury; the ſecond of ten members, the national revenues; the third of ten members, the general liquidation; and the fourth of ten members, the office of accounts.—11. A committee of legiſlation compoſed of fifteen members, which ſhall have the ſuperintendance of the commiſſion of civil adminiſtrations, the police, and the tribunals, according to the report of the tribunals and adminiſtrative bodies, ſhall be charged with the reviſion and claſſification of the laws, and the details reſpecting the territorial diviſions of the republic.---12. A committee of inſpectors of the proces-verbeaux, conſiſting of fifteeen members, is charged with ſuperintending the tranſcriptions of the convention in its offices and archives, the national preſs, and the commiſſion of civil adminiſtration.

XI. There ſhall alſo be a committee of inſpectors of the hall, compoſed of fifteen members, excluſively charged with the police within the limits of the convention, the committees, and the national garden. It ſhall regulate the expences of the national convention, and its archives, as well as thoſe of the committees; alſo, the travelling expences of the repreſentatives of the people ſent to the departments or the armies.

XII. It ſhall verify and adjuſt the accounts relative to the aforeſaid expences; and the reſolution of that committee, declaring its verification of the expences of the repreſentatives of the people, amounting to ſuch a ſum, ſhall be allowed as admiſſion of that account.

XIII. The national treaſury ſhall give it credit for three millions, to be employed in ſuch expences in the aforeſaid payments; and all former credit, hitherto unemployed, is withdrawn.

XIV. Every executive commiſſion ſhall give a daily account of its proceedings to the committee charged with its inſpection, and ſhall propoſe to it the difficulties to be ſurmounted, and the means of removing them. It ſhall alſo ſubmit for the approbation of the committee, the agents nominated for the execution of its orders.

XV. The commiſſioners ſhall every day lay before the committee for inſpecting the public expenditure and revenue, a detailed account of the expences incurred in the courſe of the day.

XVI. The committees ſhall directly propoſe to the convention all legiſlative objects, after having previouſly communicated them to the central committee of government. They ſhall concert with that committee, through the medium of one of its members, who ſhall be charged to report the executive objects diſcuſſed in the committees.

XVII. All executive objects ſhall be definitively ſettled by the central committee of government which ſhall be reſponſible for the reſolutions it may take.

Theſe reſolutions ſhall be ſigned by at leaſt ſix members in the central committee, and by the commiſſioner of the committee who ſhall make the report.

The reſolution ſhall be ſent to be executed by the commiſſions, and an account of them ſhall then be laid before the convention.

XVIII. Should there be any difference of opinion in the central committee of government; the affair is to be diſcuſſed and decided by a meeting compoſed of one commiſſioner from each of the committees.

XIX. In caſes of urgency where expedition is required, the central committee of government may call upon one or more of the committee charged with the ſuperintendance of the matter in queſtion, and the reſult of their deliberation ſhall be carried into execution But the members who ſhall aſſiſt in ſuch deliberations ſhall make an immediate report of it to the general committee.

XX. The convention ſhall itſelf nominate the repreſentatives of the people, to be ſent on any commiſſion; the generals, the members of the executive commiſſion, the members of the revolutionary tribunal, and popular commiſſions, on the propoſition of the central committee of government, united with the committee charged with what relates to that particular object.

XXI. The national convention alone has power to recall the repreſentatives of the people ſent upon commiſſions.

The central committee of government, in concert with the committee charged with that particular affair, may remove the generals, the members of the executive commiſſions, and other public functionaries, of which a report is to be made to the convention.

XXII. All the committees ſhall have a fifth of their members changed every month.

XXIII. All the committees and commiſſions within the convention ſhall continue to exerciſe their functions till the committees that are to replace them are perfectly organized.

On the fifteenth of Auguſt citizen James Monroe, ambaſſador from the United States of America, was introduced to the convention and delivered his credentials with a prefatory ſpeech; of which notice ſhall be taken in a ſeparate examination of the differences which at that time and ſubſequently aroſe to an alarming height between the two republics. On the eighth of September citizen Reybaz from the republic of Geneva was alſo received, and the flags of theſe two republics were ordered to be diſplayed in the hall of the convention with the national colours,

On the twenty-ſixth of September Freron delivered a long diſcourſe on the liberty of the preſs, and concluded by ſome forcible obſervations on the unjuſt ſeverity of penal laws in the moſt civilized nations — "The revolutionary tribunal," ſaid he, and the general police, require all your attention. The police of ignorant and barbarous nations is impriſonment; and their juſtice, death. Among nations enlightened on the ſocial art, in governments acquainted with the nature of man, a ſkilful and well-diſtributed vigilance renders numerous and cruel puniſhments unneceſſary; and penalties well apportioned to the degrees of guilt, render the puniſhment of death more terrible from being rare. What contempt has been affected among us for theſe maxims! Into what errors has this contempt led us! Let experience, which has coſt us ſo dear, bring us back to thoſe eternal principles which the genius of Monteſquieu and Beccaria draw from the hiſtory of ages. Let us think with them, that the terror of puniſhment is loſt in its frequency; and that to make death be feared we muſt ſeldom inflict it. It is not the axe which is always falling, but the axe which is always ready to fall, on which the imagination and the eye dare not fix. Multiplied puniſhments, by rendering criminals more deſparate, may deſtroy in the minds of a whole people, thoſe tender and ſublime affections, that exquiſite feeling of humanity, which are the principle, the end, and the perfection of all the ſocial virtues. I move that you order your committees of legiſlation to preſent a plan of active police and vigilance, which may keep inceſſantly under the eyes of the magiſtrate all thoſe whoſe manner of living or converſing may excite ſuſpicion. It is the weakneſs, the diſorder, and the ſloth of government, that fill the priſons. A government of order, vigilance, and energy, makes ſociety itſelf the guardian of ſociety; without ſcreening from puniſhment thoſe who are the juſt objects of it. Good patroles prevent bloody battles. Patroles may be a meaſure of police as well as of military vigilance; and perhaps, if properly organized, the beſt fitted for a revolutionary government." This ſpeech was ordered to be printed.

The concert which had been ſo deciſive againſt Robeſpierre, had not yet ſatisfied the minds of many of the members. On the twenty-ninth of Auguſt Lecointre of Verſailles, produced an accuſation againſt Barrere, Collot d'Herbois, Vadier, Billaud Varennes, Amar, and David. The charges were generally of aiding or conniving at the crimes of Robeſpierre. Bourdon of Oiſe defended the members, and the accuſation was deemed defamatory.

On the 10th of September, an attempt was made to aſſaſſinate Tallien; as he returned from the convention about twelve at night, he was accoſted by a man in a furred great coat and round hat—"Come villain, I have ſtaid for thee a long time!" he exclaimed, and then ſtruck him with his fiſt, at the ſame time diſcharging a piſtol, the ball from which penetrated Tallien's ſhoulder. The wound proved ſlight and he was enabled to reſume his functions. The aſſaſſian eſcaped. This attempt was charged on the Jacobins, which after having been ſhut up by Legendre had been opened again by Billaud Varennes, and Tallien was conſidered as one of the late accuſers of Billaud and the reſt. This circumſtance cauſed that club to be ſhortly after ſhut up intirely.

Eſchaſſeriaux, on the 7th of September, in the name of the committee charged with the reviſal of the laws againſt emigrants, ſubmitted their report to the convention. Upon this it was decreed, that "all perſons of the following deſcriptions are emigrants. Firſt, all Frenchmen who quitted the territory of the republic ſince the 1ſt of July 1789, and did not return into it by the 9th of May 1792; or having abſented themſelves from the place of their reſidence on the 9th of May 1792, or ſince that day, and cannot prove that they have reſided uninterruptedly within the territory of the republic ſince that period.

"Every perſon, who having enjoyed the rights of a French citizen, although born in a foreign country, or having two houſes, one in France, and the other in any foreign territory, who ſhall not in a ſimilar way eſtabliſh the proofs of his reſidence ſince the 9th of May 1792. Every perſon ſhall alſo be deemed an emigrant, who ſhall be convicted of quitting, during the invaſion of foreign powers, the part of the territory of the republic not invaded, and of having retired into that occupied by the enemy. Laſtly, a reſidence in the territory united to the republic, prior to the proclamation of the re-union, cannot be urged as an excuſe."

In the ſame ſitting, Fayau propoſed, that ſuch citizens as were not owners of lands, and ſuch, as were poſſeſſed of but ſmall portions, might be enabled to obtain certain allotments, for which they ſhould account at the end of twenty years; "becauſe," ſaid the orator, "when the national domains are all put up to public ſale, they inevitably become the property of the monied part of the community." Barrere ſupported the good intention of Fayau, and propoſed that the committee of public ſuccour ſhould point out a new claſs of citizens worthy of ſharing the favours of the republic, viz. married men deſtitute of fortune, from twenty-five to fifty years of age. It was alſo his opinion, that workſhops ſhould be opened for the reception of poor artiſans out of employment. He deprecated the idea of beholding commiſſaries and contractors erecting coloſſal fortunes out of the money which they had plundered from the public, and wiſhed that the committee of domains would preſent the plan of a decree, enacting, that the property of the emigrants ſhould be ſold in ſmall portions, ſo that it could not be monopolized by monied men, but might be ſhared among the real friends to the community—men of ſmall fortunes.

On the 19th of September, ſome meaſures were adopted to prevent too great an influx of ſtrangers to Paris; and on the following day, a very ample report on the ſtate of France was preſented in the name of the committees of public and general ſafety, and of legiſlation, by Robert Lindet.

"When a nation deſires to be free, it is not enough," ſays the reporter, "that the people wiſh to be ſo; they muſt be ſtrong enough to reſiſt the coalition of deſpots, and to make their liberty be acknowledged and reſpected. At this period 1,200,000 citizens in arms, who form the advanced guard of the defenders of liberty, ſweep the frontiers of Spain, the Palatinate, and the Netherlands. Every thing yields to their courage; the enemies (adds he) of the republic, ſtruck with terror, fly to their places of retreat, accuſe their chiefs and their tyrants, and murmur ſecret prayers for the ſucceſs of their conquerors; nations ſacrificed to the pride of kings, alone feel the calamities of war, and ſee in the French the avengers of the rights of man. A formidable marine, united and wiſely directed, renders impotent the fury of the enemies of France, prepares the ruin of their commerce, and promiſes the freedom of the ſeas to Gaul. The nations who had been wiſe enough to reſiſt the inſinuations of the courts of Vienna and London, hear and repeat the victories of the republic. The enemies of the French no longer aſk whether they have a government. They know, that to maintain the moſt numerous armies, to cover the ocean with ſhips of war, to fight and vanquiſh by ſea and land, to bring into their ports the commerce of the world, is to govern. The means that France uſed to attain this height of glory were—When liberty and equality were ſolemnly proclaimed, every Frenchman felt that he had a country, and for that country was ready to ſacrifice himſelf. They recalled to the minds of men that they are all equal in rights, that they are all brothers. What a ſpectacle—what an example for oppreſſed nations and for poſterity is that of a people ſacrificing every day to their country at the price of their labour, their clothing, and their ſubſiſtence; regardleſs of themſelves, and renewing to-day the ſacrifices they had yeſterday made; ſacrifices, which nothing but experience could induce us to believe within the limits of human power! The enemies of the French republic had been ſo numerous, ſo widely ſpread, ſo many means of inſinuating themſelves into the adminiſtration, the popular ſocieties, and even into their families, that every citizen was obliged to conſider himſelf as a centinel ſtationed at his poſt. The evils which the commune of Nantz had lately ſuffered, reſounded in every ear. This citadel of the Weſt ſuſtained a ſiege of more than fifteen months; it combatted the rebels and the banditti; it preſerved to the republic an important place, and the navigation of the Loire.

"The army and the navy, with the ſervices requiſite for them, had taken from agriculture and the uſeful profeſſions more than a million and an half of citizens, and in the multiplicity of her dangers and ſervices employed for the republic more on the whole than ſix millions of men, diſperſed over the various communes, independent of the conſumption occaſioned by great numbers being collected in one place.

"While the revolution was ſo powerfully agitating the minds of Frenchmen; while invincible courage, the moral qualities of natural men, the civic virtues, were raiſing them above themſelves, vice too was making rapid advances. Men were ſeen who embraced the revolution only for the ſake of the crimes they hoped to commit, and the private advantages they expected to derive from it, They wiſhed not for equality of rights; they aimed only at the confounding of fortunes, they hoped to ſquander or accumulate the wealth of others. Errors, abuſes of power, arbitrary acts, are evils inſeparable from a great revolution.

"Some weeks before the army had marched into Weſt Flanders, this country, full of fortreſſes, was covered with the forces of the allied powers. All the fortreſſes fell into the hands of the French, and the capitulation of Oſtend and Nieuport deprived the Engliſh of every communication with the Belgians. The republicans prepared before Charleroy the ſucceſs which was to crown them next day in the plains of Fleurus. A new mode of tactics reſtored Namur to them. They forced the Auſtrians to retreat. They entered Liege, where they made a ſucceſsful conqueſt. They broke the ſceptre of a prieſt, and the chains with which a deſpot bound his fellow men. At this period all the banks of the Rhine reſounded with the victories of republicans. The armies of the Moſelle and the Rhine united, put the Auſtrians and Pruſſians to flight, reſtored the communication with Landau, and ſecured the Palatinate. Collioure and Port Vendre, in the ſouth, were occupied by the Spaniards for a moment, only to give new éclat to the arms of France, and exhibit the beſt troops of Spain compelled to renounce the honours of war, and lay down their arms. The vallies of Boſſon and Lorrain ſupplied the Gallic ſoldiers for ſeveral months. Fontarabia and St. Sebaſtian gave the republic ports that ſecure the navigation of the gulph. Spain loſt founderies and manufactories of arms which would have been an eternal ſource of jealouſy, if they had been preſerved." Such was the ſtate of France, as reported on the 20th of September.

The ſame day the convention paſſed ſeveral decrees, ordering that the committee of public inſtruction ſhould draw up, every decade, a paper of inſtruction, the object of which ſhould be to revive the love of labour, to confirm the citizens in the principles of morals and attachment to their duties, to remind them of the grand events of the revolution, and to lay before them the advantages of the uſeful arts and ſciences. Theſe papers were ordered to be ſent to all the communes, to be read every decade, in the place of meeting of the general aſſembly, to which fathers, mothers, and their children, ſhould be called and incited to repair. The reading to be followed by hymns of liberty. "The national convention, deſirous of accelerating the period at which an uniform mode of inſtruction may be eſtabliſhed over all the republic, alſo order its committee of public inſtruction to preſent, within ten days, a plan of regulation for ſchools, to which ſhall be called the beſt informed citizens of all the diſtricts, in order to be taught, by the ableſt profeſſors in all branches of human knowledge, the art of teaching others."

In the month of September ſome commotions took place at Marſeilles. The principal occaſion of it was the deſire of reſcuing a perſon of the name of Regnier, who had been committed to priſon there, which they effected. The riot, however, was after this ſoon quelled. Regnier was outlawed, and the reſt of the conſpirators ordered before the tribunal.

The conteſts between the party of Tallien, and that of Barrere, Collot d'Herbois, &c. ſtill continued to agitate occaſionally the convention; and to this conteſt the Girondiſts, who had been impriſoned or outlawed from the 31ſt of May 1793, were probably in part indebted for their reſtoration to their functions. On the 22d of October, ſome of theſe members were encouraged to make application to the convention for their liberty. A long debate enſued, which afforded but little proſpect of a ſucceſsful termination. In the courſe of the ſucceeding month, however, they renewed their application, and on the 3d of December they reſumed their ſeats in the convention to the number of ſeventy-one. For Thomas Paine, though not impriſoned as having ſigned the proteſt againſt the proceedings of the 31ſt of May, but as an alien born, was alſo permitted to reſume his ſeat.

On the 12th of November, Laignelet gave an account of the reaſons which induced the committee of general ſafety to reſolve upon the ſuſpenſion of the Jacobin club. "Paſſion (he ſaid) had no ſhare in this reſolution, it was dictated by the intereſt of the country alone. While they acknowledged the good which that ſociety had done, they ſhut up their hall, only from reſpect to thoſe principles which ought not to be infringed. They were at the ſame time of opinion, that popular ſocieties might be permitted under proper reſtrictions, becauſe they are inherent in a republican government; but they could not conſider the Jacobin club as a ſociety truly and purely popular. The Jacobins were protected and ſupported while they vied in virtue, and not in power, with legitimate authority. If they were not now what they formerly were; the true friends of the people would ſee that they had attempted to vilify and degrade the convention. It is neceſſary (added the reporter) to remind the repreſentatives of the people, of principles that ought to be engraven on their hearts. In a well ordered government, two rival powers ought not to exiſt. In a republic, there muſt not be a government by the ſide of a government. On the 27th of July, the Jacobins were in open revolt: ſince that period, availing themſelves of impunity; conceiving that the national repreſentation had neither courage or character; that it conſidered them as the ſacred ark, which no unhallowed hand was permitted to touch, they have continued their plan of revolt. There is but one republic, there ought to be but one convention. The committees, who love their country, and who wiſh to unite all the members of the convention, have thought it uſeful for public liberty, to extinguiſh a flame of diſcord, of faction and diſſenſion. The committees were of opinion, that the whole people would applaud the meaſure they had adopted. It never was their intention to attack popular ſocieties. They acknowledged that they had no right to ſhut the gates but where factions are engendered, and civil war publicly recommended. The ſocieties of the ſections are truly the ſocieties of the people, and the committees declared they would maintain them." This ſtep of the committees met with the warmeſt approbation of the whole convention, and was alſo greatly applauded by the people at large.

The next meaſure which the convention adopted, was to bring to puniſhment the perpetrators of the horrid cruelties in La Vendée. Carrier, a repreſentative of the people, who had taken a very active part againſt the rebels in that department, was the principal object fixed upon as a public example. The convention paſſed a decree of accuſation againſt him. His defence was able and argumentative; and its failure of ſucceſs may ſerve to convince future inſtruments of tyranny and cruelty, that, though criminal actions may be juſtified by the applauſe of thoſe who order them, and paſs with impunity during the period of their predominant power, yet they will be puniſhed when that power has fallen into other hands. Carrier, after a long trial before the revolutionary tribunal, was ſentenced to death, and executed ſoon afterwards with two of the revolutionary committee of Nantz, who were found participators in his crimes: the reſt of the revolutionary committee were acquitted.

After the convention had, in this manner, atoned in ſome degree for the cruelties committed by Robeſpierre's party and inſtruments, they iſſued a proclamation to the inſurgent royaliſts themſelves, which cannot but be allowed to be both politic and humane, and containing offers too liberal to be refuſed without regarding the name of royaliſts and that of banditti. That proclamation held out a free pardon to all who ſhould depoſit their arms in the reſpective communes within one month after the day of its date; proper commiſſioners were ſent to the rebellious departments to ſee the decree made upon the occaſion properly executed; and it has ſince appeared, that it was attended with the moſt ſalutary effects.

On the thirtieth of December the decree for giving no quarter to the Engliſh and Hanoverians was repealed. The triumphs of the French arms were ſo ſignal at this time that this meaſure ſeems to have been dictated by a magnanimous pity as well as generoſity, for the French ſoldiers had been ſo much at this period in the habit of purſuit, and their enemies of flight, that they forgot all their enmity in their triumphs, and ſpared the Engliſh and Hanoverians wherever they fell in their power out of the heat of battle.

In the courſe of this year the ingenuity and enterprize of the French nation were diſplayed in ſome remarkable inſtances. The important uſe on which the art of æroſtation had been employed at the battle of Fleurus has been before noticed; a company of æronauts was afterwards attached to every army.

Another invention, the telegraph from the Greek tele diſtant, and graphos to write, was uſed with equal effect. By this machine the intelligence of the capture of Queſnoy was conveyed to Paris in an hour after the French troops had entered that place. The machine is ſimple, conſiſting of ſeveral pannels movable on an axis; the number of thoſe preſented to the view are the indications of particular ſigns previouſly agreed upon; and the number of queſtions or anſwers, or the ſigns of words or letters may be varied to infinity by the variation of the numbers or poſitions of the pannels. One of theſe telegraphs ſtationed at Paris communicated the ſigns to another at a convenient diſtant, and thus by a chain of ſimilar machines repeating the ſigns or diſpoſitions from one to the other, the thing intended to be communicated is effected, without being known to any of the agents, but thoſe who poſſeſs the book containing the key to each ſign; which like ſignals at ſea may be changed and varied at diſcretion.

On the modes which the French have adopted for the production of ſalt-petre in ſuch quantities as to preclude the neceſſity of a foreign ſupply, we are not able to give an exact account, as we believe they have never been made public, One diſcovery, connected with this ſubject it may be proper to notice, as it was preſented to the convention by the Lyceum of arts on the eleventh of September. Of that inſtitution the committee of ſubſiſtence had requeſted, that they would undertake ſome experiment in order to diſcover a ſubſtitute for grain in the fabrication of ſtarch; and they found upon examination of ſeveral different materials, that the fruit of the horſe-cheſnut tree, freed from its acrid parts by a peculiar property, would furniſh a quantity of ſtarch which is well adapted to every commercial purpoſe. They carried their reſearches ſtill farther upon this hitherto uſeleſs vegetable, and the reſult was certainly of great importance to commerce and manufactures. They found that, by burning the horſe-cheſnut, according to a proceſs deſcribed in their memoir, from twelve and an half ounces of cinders they were able to collect the amazing product of nine ounces of pot-aſh of the firſt quality.

Hitherto the civil tranſactions of the revolution have preſented a wonderful ſcene; reformation progreſſing amidſt diſorder, and the liberty of the nation gaining ſtrength and ſtability in proportion to the magnitude of oppoſition and danger with which it is threatened; often force co-operating with private conſpiracy, and faction ſo fatal to revolutions only adding to the energy required to ſurmount oppoſition; virtue for a while purſuing its grand carreer, but falling under the gripe of licentiouſneſs and uſurpation; and at length like the phoenix riſing out of ruin, the genius of liberty and virtue aſſumes her reign more beautiful, more vigorous, and worthy of admiration.

The importance of the civil events in the laſt half year of 1794, required that they ſhould be detailed without interruption. The military atchievements from the capture of Landrecy, the memorable battle of Fleurus, the fall of Tournay, the evacuation of Oſtend, and other important places, have been already detailed, and returns of the loſſes of the allies, down to the firſt of July.

At that period we ſhall recommence the narration of a campaign, which every moment encreaſes in intereſt, and which for the valour and ſucceſs with which it was carried on eclipſes the moſt ſplendid atchievements of ancient times or previous modern hiſtory.

The unfeeling politician who knows no principle but ambition, no happineſs but what is derived from the poſſeſſion of power, and who never weighs the evils of war by the afflictions which it cauſes to millions, but by the gratification it affords to himſelf or his patron, may admire at leiſure the bravery of the Auſtrians, Pruſſians, and Engliſh, in oppoſing the French revolution and invading France. But the friend of human nature turns with impatience from the miſtakes and madneſs of men who preſs forward as if it were to enjoy the pleaſures of a fine ſpectacle, to ſee men conteſt with others whom they never ſaw, for a victory from which they derive no advantage or ſecurity, for a place which they never ſaw, or for words which they do not underſtand, or things which they never can enjoy. The fierceſt animals of prey never fight but for their food and the objects of their paſſions. The frequency of wars is owing to the ignorance and willing infatuation of the people. The conteſts of the French bear another character; they contended for the quiet poſſeſſion of their homes againſt remote invaders who had no right or intereſt in their domeſtic tranſactions. They ſought only to be happy by means that appeared to them capable of rendering that happineſs moſt diffuſive and durable. Theſe are objects to be comprehended, in theſe objects the meaneſt and moſt ignorant individual has a ſhare, and the pooreſt have the greateſt ſhare, becauſe the rich poſſeſs means which in ſome degree place them above the defects of ſocial inſtitutions, and render even bad laws and bad governments ſubſervient to their riches. It is good government only that can ſecure happineſs to the poor. Theſe are facts ſelf-evident. But what is to be ſaid of intelligent beings who hire others and are hired to ſpill the blood of perſons whom they do not know, who have done them no injury;—of beings who are willing to be hired to kill perſons againſt whom they have no enmity, to gratify perſons with whom they have no acquaintance, for whom they have no cauſe of love or even reſpect! For perſons who aſſume the ridiculous title of their maſter or ſuperior, and who bids them die to ſupport his pretenſions or his capricious or corrupt views!--Are there any countries in which ſuch men of either character are to be found? Are there any in countries which like France have already had to fight in defence of their fire-ſides?

The beginning of July was fatal to the invaders of France at all points; victory ſmiled uninterruptedly on the arms of the republic. There was no longer an enemy to face them in Weſt-Flanders; Nieuport, Sluys, and the other fortified places were left to their own ſtrength, and the generals Moreau and Michaud with their diviſions were left to reduce them with the left wing of Pichegru's army while the centre and right purſued the enemy.

On the firſt of July, Jourdan with the army now called of the Sambre and Meuſe, drove the enemy from Mount Pallifel and defeated Cobourg near Mons, and that place immediately ſubmitted; and on the third, Oudenarde, Ghent, and Tournay ſubmitted to Pichegru. Cobourg was obliged by Jourdan to abandon St. Amand, Marchiennes, and Cateau, Conde, Valenciennes, Queſnoy, and Landrecy were now abandoned to their own ſtrength.

It is a remarkable circumſtance in the hiſtory of this period, that the ſucceſs of the army under Jourdan, and particularly the glories of the field of Fleurus, excited an enmity in the boſom of Pichegru which never ceaſed, and which had very unhappy though not the moſt fatal effects on the operations of the campaign; this became ſoon viſible, and the commiſſioners with the army therefore took upon them to direct the operations of the army under Jourdan themſelves.

Cobourg next attempted to make a ſtand in the foreſt of Soignes, where he intrenched himſelf ſtrongly. The French attacked them with the bayonet and carried all. The allies loſt in this action, which took place on the ſixth of July, 7,000 men, and with the miſerable remains of this army Cobourg retreated in the night through Bruſſels and its environs. He had previouſly ordered the magiſtrates to enjoin the inhabitants upon pain of death, to confine themſelves to their own houſes, lock their doors, and even bar up their windows. Such was the melancholy fate of that emperor's repreſentative who had ſo lately diſplayed the ſupremacy of his folly there.

Hitherto the republicans won every ſtep by invincible perſeverance; and not a day paſſed without ſome ſevere conflict or ſome town ſurrendered; but actions which on other occaſions would be in themſelves deemed great, were here loſt in the magnitude of vaſt and numerous victories.

The two armies now approached. The army of the north under Pichegru marched from Ghent on the ninth, and encamped at Eroneghem behind Aloſt. On the tenth they encamped at Ache, and on the eleventh behind the canal of Vilvorde. On the ſame day Jourdan with a detachment of the army of the Sambre and Meuſe entered Bruſſels and ſtationed a garriſon there. The junction of the two armies, was a truly ſplendid ſcene, it repreſented rather the hilarity of a civic feſtival than the parade of conquering legions. The people of Bruſſels mixed with the republicans, and a ſcene of tranquil confidence and pleaſure ſucceeded the gloomy horrors that prevailed during the preſence of the allied armies. The magazines and ſtores which fell into the hands of the French in the courſe of their progreſs is beyond calculation; the rich harveſt of the Netherlands was then ripening on the ground; and contributions of corn and money, were levied on the corporations and the monks.

It was not till the nineteenth that Nieuport ſurrendered, and a number of emigrants there and at Mons were executed as traitors.

During this progreſs of the republicans, the army under the duke of York, no longer able to retain its poſition at Gramont, after the fall of Ghent and Oudenard, had on the fourth of July began a retreat from that poſition, and about four o'clock in the afternoon arrived at the heights of Lombecke St. Catharine. The marquis Cornwallis, who had been ſent by the Engliſh miniſtry with a view to perſuade the king of Pruſſia to entruſt the command of his army to the marquis, had now returned without ſucceſs to join the duke of York, and accompanied the army on their retreat from Gramont to Antwerp, where he left them on the tenth of July, thinking his preſence and advice no longer capable of advancing the ſervice. At this time lord Moira who was at Aloſt, had his out-poſts attacked on the ſixth by the republicans, and the pickets being driven in, the French penetrated to the town, they were afterwards repulſed; but Moira was obliged to retreat and joined the duke of York on the eighth, who had left Lombecke on the fifth and marched to Mechlin. On the twelfth the out-poſts occupied by the Engliſh in front of the canal of Louvain leading from Bruſſels to Antwerp, were attacked and driven into Mechlin, which the French attacked but were repulſed. On the fifteenth Pichegru renewed the attack; the allies were ſtrongly entrenched behind the canal, between it and Malines, which the Engliſh troops alſo occupied with all the ground between the canal and the river Dyle; they were forced in all points, and the French were ſo eager to come into action, that finding the delay in paſſing by the ordinary ways too great, threw themſelves into the water and ſwam acroſs, attacking the enemy with the bayonet as they landed. They purſued them into Malines, and the allies fled from Mechlin; at the former place the gate of Louvain was blocked up by great piles of fire-wood to cover their retreat, but the French ſcaled the walls and purſued the fugitives along the cauſeway towards Antwerp, which was now alſo deemed a dangerous poſition. In this action the French took a conſiderable number of cannon and ſmall arms, and ſeveral priſoners; they however loſt an able officer, general Proteau. Their advance guard purſued the enemy to Neethe, and drove the allies behind that river. Lord Moira left the army for England on the twentieth and took his leave of the troops in public orders—The duke of York continuing in the neighbourhood of Antwerp only to keep the republicans in check, while the Dutch repaired their fortifications.

The prince of Cobourg at this time informed the duke of York by letter, that he meant to have given battle to the French, had not the Dutch fallen back, and left the army too weak to attempt it. In this letter he ſays, ſpeaking of the allies—"We ſeem to be bewitched"; an expreſſion that marks the confuſion and diſorder that prevailed.

The prince of Orange had in the beginning of the month taken poſt at Waterloo, and was at firſt ſucceſsful in repelling the French. But he was ſoon after compelled to abandon his poſt, and attempted to make a ſtand at the canal of Louvain, but on the ſixteenth he was driven acroſs the Dyle, and took poſt for ſome time at Nyle, while the ſtadtholder alarmed for his ſafety ſolicited the Dutch by inceſſant proclamations to make a levy of every tenth man in the United Provinces; but without the leaſt effect, the majority of the people were attached to the French, and the reſt were either plunged in deſpair or indifference.

The left wing of Jourdan's army, under Kleber, having proceeded without delay to Louvain and Judoigne, thoſe places ſubmitted on the fifteenth, while the right conſiſting of the diviſions of Lefebre, Dubois, Championnet, and Morlet, to favour the movement, advanced in front of the Dyle. At the iron mountain the unfortunate Clairfait attempted to make a ſtand againſt Kleber, but was completely defeated with the loſs in killed, wounded, and priſoners, of ſix thouſand men; Lefebre and Dubois meanwhile had ſeized the important poſition of the abbey of Florival. Lefebre while Louvain was inveſted drove the Auſtrians from Tirlemont.

It was the intention of the allies at firſt to defend Namur, and to form a line of defence from thence to Antwerp; but the republicans had anticipated the deſign, and by inceſſant attacks totally diſconcerted the plan. And Namur was abandoned by general Beaulieu on the ſixteenth of July, leaving behind two hundred men who ſurrendered the citadel and garriſon on the firſt ſummons. Jourdan diſpatched the keys of this fortreſs to the convention on the twentieth.

The important paſſage of Lier, where general Walmoden was poſted, was forced nearly about the ſame time; and on the twenty-third the army of the north proceeded towards Antwerp, and ſent a trumpeter to inform the inhabitants of their intention to viſit them the ſucceeding morning—The Engliſh did not wait for the republicans, who entered the place at eleven o'clock the next day, and took poſſeſſion of the town and citadel without oppoſition. The Engliſh previous to their departure ſet fire to their magazines of forage, and deſtroyed in different kinds of ſtores, according to their own account, to the amount of half a million ſterling! The French account ſtates that they took immenſe magazines, eſpecially of hay undeſtroyed, beſide thirty pieces of braſs artillery.

The retreat of the Auſtrians from Louvain left open the territory of Liege, to Jourdan, who loſt no time in their purſuit, and preſſed the enemy cloſely towards Maeſtricht. His advance guard proceeded towards the Jaar, and on the twenty-ſeventh of July (the memorable ninth of Thermidor) entered Tongres and Liege. The allies reſiſted for ſome time before the latter place and kept up a heavy cannonade, but the republican charge, ſays general Ernouf, put them to flight; and the French were received with the greateſt rejoicing in the town, the inhabitants having taken arms and attacked the Auſtrians at the ſame time. The allies in their retreat obſtinately defended the bridge acroſs the Meuſe while the main body retreated to the heights of Chartreux, where they had formed an entrenched camp; this poſition alſo commanded the bridge, and they opened ſeveral batteries upon it and bombarded the town at the ſame time, and with a petty ſpirit of revenge deſtroyed both their friends and the peaceable neutral citizens. It was now neceſſary that the armies of the republic ſhould turn their attention to the fortreſſes in the rear, before they proceeded farther beyond the frontier. They therefore halted, and the Auſtrians took poſſeſſion of the oppoſite banks of the Meuſe from Ruremond to Maeſtricht, the latter place being protected by a covering army. The Engliſh and Dutch, having retired beyond Breda, were encamped at Oſterwiſt, and its environs, a corps poſted at Ludhoven keeping open their communication.

About this period Lillo was evacuated, and general Moreau who had taken Nieuport on the eighteenth, executed one of the boldeſt enterpriſes of the campaign. It being reſolved to lay ſiege to Sluys, it was neceſſary to the complete inveſtment of that place that the republicans ſhould make themſelves maſters of the iſland of Cadſand. This part of the enterpriſe preſented the moſt diſcouraging obſtacles. The only apparent means by which it could be approached was a very narrow cauſeway, inundated on both ſides, and commanded by fourteen pieces of cannon. With ſuitable materials a bridge might be thrown acroſs the ſtrait of Coſchiſche, but Moreau had no pontoons; all his reſources were a few boats, of which it was impoſſible to form a bridge. The valor of the troops ſtood in the place of other means; the arms and ammunition were put into the few boats, numbers of the ſoldiers were towed acroſs, and others ſwam; they made good their landing in the face of numerous and formidable batteries, and took the place, with ninety pieces of cannon, one third of them braſs, a great quantity of ammunition, and two hundred priſoners. The garriſon of Sluys had been ſummoned in July, by general Almain, but the commander Vander Dugn returned an anſwer remarkable for its brevity and ſpirit—"The honour of defending Sluys, that of commanding a brave garriſon, and "the confidence they repoſe in me, are my anſwer."—This gallant officer reſiſted till the twenty-fifth of Auguſt, when honourable terms were granted; the garriſon were made priſoners of war, but marched out with the honors of war, "In the teſtimony (ſays Moreau) of the fine defence they made."

The efforts of the ſtadtholder to raiſe the Hollanders, had been copied by the prince of Cobourg; who iſſued to the Germans the following exhortation, which exhibits at once their nopeleſsneſs, and the deſparate reſolution which had been taken to deſtroy all the country rather than ſuffer it to be conquered.

"German Brothers and Friends,—Our valorous armies have juſt quitted the fertile plains, in which they have ſuſtained the moſt ſevere combats during three bloody campaigns, for the preſervation of your property, the repoſe of your lives, the ſecurity of your fields, the maintenance of your religion, the happineſs of your children, the riches of your flouriſhing provinces, and to ſave thoſe provinces from ruin and complete annihilation.—Plains in which they maintained, at the expence of their blood which has flowed for three ſucceſſive years, the glory of their arms, by the ſacrifice of their lives and of their means; while they ſacrificed thoſe deareſt ties which attach men of diſtant nations, not leſs than yourſelves, to their homes and their country; and while they voluntarily renounced all the domeſtic happineſs they had a right to expect.

"The inexhauſtible reſources of a nation in a ſtate of furor, which ſports with the life and happineſs of man, with religion, with the duties, and the bands of civil ſociety; its innumerable cohorts which are led to ſlaughter by their tyrants, and who, by laviſhing their blood, purchaſe the fleeting ſhadow of an imaginary liberty; the activity of a blinded people, who would not liſten to the approach of danger any more than to the paternal voice of their good prince; the ſecret practices, which we hardly know by what name to call, of ſeveral of their ambitious repreſentatives, men of whom this very people ſee, now too late, and abhor, the authors of their unbounded and unceaſing miſery.—All theſe cauſes have forced our armies to retreat to your frontiers.

"It is there that they are now poſted,—weakened, but not vanquiſhed; fatigued by an unequal conteſt,—but not humbled by diſcouragement, nor ſubdued by deſpair. It is there that they form, as it were, an advanced wall of defence for the Germanic liberty; to act as a rampart for your religion, your laws, and your families. The Meuſe is a line of ſeparation between the total loſs and the preſervation, between the overthrow and the maintenance of all theſe; between miſery and happineſs. Riſe then, German brothers and friends! On you will depend the making it poſſible for your deliverers to live or die for your defence. I, myſelf a German prince, full of ſolicitude, not leſs for the ſafety of my country, than the preſervation of my warriors—I call upon you. Procure us ſubſiſtence, bring us proviſions from our magazines. Think that in forwarding to us theſe painful ſuccours you ſecure at the ſame time your approaching harveſt.—

Share with us your ſavings.—To obtain what we want, employ the treaſures of your churches. Give your utenſils and vaſes of ſilver to the emperor, for the pay of your defenders. You will receive receipts for the payment in due form, and you will be paid intereſt for the pecuniary aids you have thus procured, Replace the reſources of Belgium, which have been cut off from us, and now flow for our enemies. Nurſe and relieve with a ſolicitude full of charity our ſick and wounded.

" Riſe courageous people of the fair countries of the Rhine and Moſelle! Arm yourſelves, ye valorous men! Line your rivers and your defiles! Accompany our convoys! Watch over our magazines! Riſe by thouſands, and fight with us for your altars, for your habitations, for your emperor, for your liberty! We will not lead you beyond the rivers of your country! We will not depopulate your provinces; but you will ſecure the poſitions at our backs, you will guard your own confines. Aſſuredly, German citizens, we are not deceived with reſpect to you; we have repoſed our confidence in the good ſenſe of Germans; we truſt to the hearts and the blood of the German nation. For three years your emperor has borne the heavy burden, and diſtant nations have fought for your defence. You yourſelves muſt ſee that your turn to take arms is now come. Then I, as commander in chief of a faithful, approved, and courageous army, promiſe in the name of my troops—To ſpare you we will obſerve a rigorous diſcipline; for your happineſs we will ſhed the laſt drop of our blood; as we have fought for you, we will die for you; and never ſhall the free, the happy Germany, bow down the head beneath the ſteel of the Guillotine—Never ſhall her peaceful inhabitants exchange their generous morals, their tranquil ſimplicity, their guardian laws of property, their conſoling religion, for the licentiouſneſs, the calumniating ſpirit, the legalized ſyſtem of ſpoil, the incredulity, impoſed by force, of the French.

" But if, on the other hand, you ſhould be ſo unfortunate, like thoſe inhabitants of the Belgic provinces, who now groan in the boſom of calamity, deprived of their property, their liberty, their altars, as to ſuffer yourſelves to be miſled by ſecret ſeducers, we ſhall find ourſelves obliged to repaſs the Rhine, to leave you a prey to your enemies, and to withdraw from you, without ceremony, whatever the enemy might find among you for their ſubſiſtence. (Signed) The prince of Cobourg, Field-marſhal.

" Done at our head-quarters, at Foron-le-Compte, July 30, 1794."

The armies of the Rhine and Moſelle, were not inactive during the ſucceſſes of their brethren. On the 12th of July, general Michaud attacked the Pruſſians near Edickhofen; and to favour the operations in that quarter, advanced a corps at the ſame time upon the Auſtrians before Spires, the conteſt was long and bloody, and both parties claimed the victory. The French general of diviſion Laboiſſiere, by venturing too far, was taken priſoner. On the following day the French under general Deſaix made a falſe attack with the right wing of the ſame army, while the main body of the Pruſſians was attacked with renewed vigor; the battle laſted from early in the morning till nine at night; and Deſaix meanwhile had taken poſſeſſion of Freſchbach and Freimerſheim. At the ſame time the other diviſion combined its movements to the left of the mountain under the general of diviſion Meignier, with generals Siſca and Deſgranges under him, attacked and carried by aſſault, amidſt a terrible fire, the important poſts fortified and occupied by the Pruſſians on Platoberg, the higheſt mountain in the territory of Deux Ponts. The attack on this place was ſeven times renewed before it was carried; nine guns, beſides ammunition, waggons, horſes, and a number of priſoners, was taken by the republicans. The Pruſſian general Pfau was killed in the action, and two others wounded. The remainder of the corps under Hohenloe retired at midnight to Edickhoffen.

On the fourteenth the French attacked the outpoſts at Tripſtadt and drove them in; the allies were intrenched on ſhelving declivities, and the conteſt became ſharp and bloody, but by their uſual preſeverance they took from the allies ſix field-pieces and two howitzers; their loſs was three hundred men; but that of the allies was more conſiderable, as Moreau ſays—"many of the enemy were cut to pieces in their flight, and the number very great indeed."

On the afternoon of the fifteenth the French repeated their attack on the whole chain of poſts from Neuſtadt to the Rhine, along the Rhebach, From two o'clock till eight the cannonade continued without intermiſſion, and the republicans were at length victorious; in the night the Auſtrians retreated with great precipitation. The imperialiſts paſſed the Rhine, and the Pruſſians under Hohenloe retreated to Gunterſblum by way of Dorcheim. Another corps of Pruſſians took the road of Winweiller towards Mentz. The French were computed to have loſt four hundred men in theſe actions; but Keiſerſlautern was abandoned to the republicans.

The army of the Moſelle proceeded on the fifth of Auguſt in three columns with a promiſe to meet at the ſame hour of a given day at Treves. The column under general Ambert took the route along the right bank of the Moſelle between that river and Luxembourg; general Renaud to the right of the Saar; and the third column advanced in the centre between the Saar and Moſelle. The columns encountered and defeated ſeveral ſmall parties in their route, always charging with the bayonet; the Auſtrians driven from Renich, took refuge in Luxembourg, from whence they were alſo driven. The column of the left obtained a very important victory, The mountain Verte ſo famous in hiſtory, at the foot of which the tyrant Louis XIV. loſt fifteen thouſand men in one day; at the foot of which the French had been defeated by treachery in the laſt campaign, was now occupied by the Auſtrians; ſtrong by nature, by art, palliſadoed with cannon, and the principal defence of Treves; the word was given the Auſtrians occupy the mountain!—The charge was made and bayonets alone were oppoſed to ſhowers of balls and bombs.—It was taken. The three columns united on the eighth on an immenſe plain, and immediately by an inſtantaneous evolution ſurrounded Treves on every ſide. One of the columns entered the city in the evening, the enemy having haſtily evacuated it upon the intimation of their approach, and fled to Coblentz. The magiſtrates met the French in their robes at the gates, and preſented them the keys, congratulated them on their ſucceſs, and declared that they were glad to receive them. An Engliſh writer ſpeaking of this army ſays—"They had no ſooner entered Treves, than as uſual they eſtabliſhed a municipality; they broke in upon no property whatever, and left the different corporations, and all civil and religious inſtitutions as they found them." The city provided an hundred thouſand rations of bread for the army the next day; and the republicans poſted troops on the heights, ſo that they now commanded beſide Treves, the rivers Saar and Moſelle and a great part of the electorate.

The good effects of the ſyſtem which ſucceeded the ſanguinary tyranny of Robeſpierre was ſoon viſible in France, nor was it confined to the republic but extended to all the conquered countries. Invincible in the field, and generous to thoſe whom they conquered, the towns of the German and Flemiſh provinces ſpontaneouſly opened their gates, and received the French as friends and brothers. Such generoſity in war independent of the high character which it confers on the victors, is always the wiſeſt and moſt politic. The Auſtrians treated their unhappy ſubjects of the ancient provinces with a ferocity and barbariſm that was at the ſame time fatal to their cauſe, and rendered their defeats the themes of triumph and rejoicing, where even their own language only was ſpoken.

After theſe ſucceſſes it was not reaſonable to expect that the fortreſſes which had been conquered from the French, inſulated as they now were, and cut off from all ſuccours and ſupplies, ſhould long reſiſt. Landrecy was inveſted by Scherer, with a body compoſed of the national-guards and volunteers of the communes of Aveſnes and Maubege, incorporated with a diviſion of the army. As if to ſhew his inflexible determination to carry the place without loſs of time, the general opened his firſt parallel at only one hundred and thirty toiſes from the works; and this bold meaſure eventually ſpared the effuſion of blood; for the garriſon not apprehending the beſiegers to be ſo near, directed their fire in ſuch a manner that the ſhot went one hundred toiſes over the ground on which the workmen were employed, Without firing a gun the general ſummoned the town, and the garriſon being adviſed that no capitulation would be admitted, they ſurrendered at diſcretion the fifteenth of July. Two thouſand men compoſed the garriſon, and beſides ninety pieces of cannon which were originally mounted on the fortifications, the French found twenty-ſix others.

Queſnoy followed the fate of Landrecy; the garriſon conſiſting of three thouſand men ſurrendered at diſcretion; there were found therein one hundred and nineteen pieces of Auſtrian and Dutch cannon, a conſiderable quantity of ammunition, arms, and proviſions. A number of emigrants were alſo taken there. During this ſiege the rains were inceſſant and heavy, and filled the trenches with water, but the works never abated. The telegraph was uſed firſt to communicate the intelligence of the fall of this place, and Barrere reported its ſurrender to the convention in an hour after it had taken place.

Valenciennes capitulated on the 26th of Auguſt; the garriſon were made priſoners of war, but conducted to the firſt Imperial or Dutch poſts, and not to ſerve againſt the republic until regularly exchanged. Eleven hundred emigrants were delivered up to the victors. Two hundred and twenty-ſeven pieces of cannon, eight hundred thouſand pounds of powder, an immenſe quantity of caſt iron, full magazines, one thouſand head of horned cattle, ſome horſes, great quantities of oats, and other corn, ſilver, papers, memoirs, plans, three millions of florins, and ſix millions and a half of livres, were found in the fortreſs. So earneſt had the Emperor been in repairing and improving the fortifications, that three millions of florins were expended on that work alone.

The laſt of theſe four fortreſſes which was reſtored to the republic was Conde. Here the allies had formed their grand depot, and the magazines and ſtores which fell into the poſſeſſion of the beſiegers were immenſe; this intelligence was communicated by Carnot to the convention in the midſt of a tumultuous debate on the accuſations againſt Billaud and others; the intelligence was received by the telegraph, and it was immediately decreed, that the army had deſerved well of their country, and that this decree ſhould be communicated by the telegraph to general Scherer.

A corps of ſixteen hundred and ſix men formed the garriſon of Conde, and ſurrendered priſoners of war. Beſides proviſions, there were found in the fortreſs a hundred and ſixty-one pieces of cannon, ſix thouſand muſquets, beſides thoſe of the garriſon, three hundred thouſand pounds of powder, one hundred thouſand bombs, balls, and ſhells; one million five hundred thouſand cartridges, ſix hundred thouſand pounds of lead, one hundred and ninety one waggons laden with ſtores, and proviſions, with their horſes and furniture. The fortifications were in the moſt complete repair, and there were caſemates for a more numerous garriſon.

The Engliſh army after their retreat from the vicinity of Antwerp proceeded to Breda, which it was determined to defend, and a Dutch garriſon was ſtationed there for that purpoſe. The right column of the Engliſh marched through Breda on the 4th of Auguſt, while the left took a circuitous route. They then took a poſition which had been previouſly marked for them about four miles diſtant from Breda. In this ſtation they continued ſome days at the requeſt of the Prince of Orange while he was occupied in fortifying Breda. The Engliſh at this time amounted to twenty-five thouſand men.

From Breda the Engliſh retreated about the latter end of Auguſt towards Bois-le-duc, with little moleſtation, excepting a ſlight ſkirmiſh with an advanced party of French. A Dutch garriſon of ſeven thouſand men was alſo left in this fortreſs. In the beginning of September the Engliſh troops were alarmed by the approach of a body of troops under Pichegru, who had moved on the 24th of Auguſt from Tournhout, and on the 28th took another poſition at Hoogſtraten behind the Merk. The retreat of the duke of York to Bois-le-duc was occaſioned by this movement. The Engliſh having then encamped at Heeſwick, whereby Breda was abandoned to the efforts of its garriſon. The Dutch army remained at Ramdauk.

The troops under Scherer, now joined Jourdan, having performed the brilliant ſervice of reducing four celebrated fortreſſes, with forty thouſand men, which would have required two hundred thouſand men in the commencement of the campaign. An evident proof that fortreſſes can only hold out ſo long as there are covering armies. The armies of the republic were at this period in the beſt ſtate of health and ſpirits. Though the ſeaſon was already advanced, they took little repoſe. The moſt piercing cold, and deep ſnows already prevailed, but this early ſeverity of the ſeaſon only ſerved to harden the troops, nor did it prevent them from ſwimming all the arms of the Rhine and conquering Holland.

The advance guard of the republicans attacked and forced the Engliſh poſts on the Dommel and the village of Boxtel; this poſt was fortified naturally by the river and a rapid ſtream, which it was firſt neceſſary to croſs, and afterwards the river, to make an attack on the main body. The bridges had been all broken down by the Engliſh. This ſomewhat retarded the action, but the republicans ſwam the river, and were in ſufficient force to commence the attack at three o'clock in the afternoon, which continued till ſix. The intrepidity diſplayed by the republicans in croſſing the river had a great influence on the fate of the action. Two Engliſh battalions laid down their arms to thirty huſſars. The victory was complete; twelve hundred priſoners, ſeven pieces of cannon, and a number of artillery equipage were taken. But a ſtill more important advantage reſulted from theſe ſucceſſes. The Engliſh found it impoſſible to remain any longer on the left bank of the Meuſe, and were obliged to retreat acroſs that river on the ſixteenth, abandoning the fortreſſes of Bergen-op-Zoom, Breda, and Bois-le-duc, to the defence of their own garriſons, and the entrance to Holland left open. General Souham and adjutant-general Reunier narrowly eſcaped being taken near Boxtel, by venturing too far in reconnoitring,

The Dutch accounts say the allies loſt two thouſand killed in this action beſide the priſoners.

The emperor whoſe complaints and exhortations had been attended with ſo little ſucceſs, on the ſeventeenth of Auguſt preſented a memorial to the circle of the Upper Rhine, preſaging the moſt dreadful conſequences unleſs vigorous and efficacious meaſures ſhould be taken to create reſources. He ſpoke with much feeling on the large ſubſidy received by Pruſſia from England, and yet that the Pruſſian troops had not been brought into action. He threatened to withdraw his troops unleſs the empire ſtept forward to oppoſe the irruption; and he reminded the ſpiritual and temporal communities that they were poſſeſſed of treaſures ſtill untouched, which might be beneficially employed.

The Germanic circles, however, did not feel ſo forcibly for their own ſecurity as their more benevolent ally of England, who diſpatched earl Spencer and Mr. Thomas Grenville to Vienna with proffers of money; but they found the emperor not ſatisfied with the ſcanty ſupply which they were authoriſed to give; however, the generoſity of the Engliſh court was not to be reſtricted by trifling conſiderations, and they conſented to grant all the emperor's wiſhes, which extended only to ſix millions ſterling. But the emperor was to bring into the field 200,000 men, and Cobourg, who had differed on ſo many points in military affairs from the royal hope of the majeſty of England, was to be diſmiſſed from his command; and he accordingly took leave of the army by an addreſs affectionate and pathetic on the thirtieth of Auguſt. Engliſh politicians have aſſerted that Cobourg was accuſed of a correſpondence with the French, but thoſe who have ſtudied the tranſactions of the war, will pay little regard to ſuch ſpeculations. That there may have been intrigues is poſſible, and the circumſtances of M. Bellin, who had been the private ſecretary of Mirabeau to the day of his death, having been at this period the actual ſecrerary of the Imperial miniſter at London, and continued to be employed at Vienna favours ſuch a conjecture.

After the defeat at Treves, a part of the imperial army under the duke of Saxe-Teſchen retreated up the Rhine to cover Mentz and Coblentz. This body of troops amounted to 95,535 men, of whom 65,000 were troops of the empire. The Pruſſians added to theſe made the whole allied force on the Rhine on the firſt of September not leſs than 150,000 men.

The army of the Sambre and Meuſe, had from the latter end of July to the beginning of September, confined its operations to ſlight enterpriſes, and movements calculated to promote diſcipline. The Auſtrians during this time remained ſtrongly entrenched not far from Liege. On the right ſide of the Aywaille, the banks of which were defended by remarkable ſteep works, the Auſtrian general Latour occupied two ſtrongly fortified camps. On the eighteenth of September Jourdan with four columns attacked the whole of this line from Aywaille to Emeux. All the paſſages were forced with the bayonet, and the camps were taken at full charge. The enemy left 2,000 dead on the field of battle, and ſeveral of their battallions were reduced to one hundred and fifty men. Seven hundred priſoners, twenty-ſix pieces of large cannon, three ſtandards, an hundred horſes and forty ammunition waggons were taken, as well as the general's carriage, ſecretary, and all his private papers. The remainder of the Auſtrians were routed or diſperſed, and in the night the camp of the Chartreux was completely abandoned. The Auſtrian accounts of this action add, that the whole of their left wing was deſtroyed on this occaſion; three new raiſed companies of the legion of the archduke Charles were cut to pieces, and the regiment of Beaulieu, loſt all of its officers and moſt of its men. The emperor's own regiment of horſe was cut to pieces, and Murray's regiment of infantry loſt nine hundred men. Jourdan had launched his two balloons prior to the commencement of this action, with two ſkilful engineers, who paſſed down ſucceſſive notes deſcribing the ſituation and every movement of the enemy, and by this means diſconcerted all their operations, and enabled the republicans to form attacks where there was an appearance of advantage.

Clairfait who was poſted between Liege and Maeſtricht, was no ſooner informed of the defeat of Latour, then he diſpatched eight battalions to his ſupport; by this aid Latour was enabled to collect his diſperſed troops on the night of the 18th; Jourdan, however, attacked him again on the 19th with his uſual impetuoſity, and drove the enemy to Hervé, taking all the Auſtrian artillery. The corps de reſerve of Latour, was under general Dalton, nephew of that general who was killed at Dunkirk, this body was alſo attacked by the French and driven into Aix-la-chapelle in ſuch confuſion that the roads from thence to Cologn were covered with the fugitives, and it was three days before they could be rallied. Clairfait was in conſequence obliged to retreat as far as Juliers, and on the 21ſt the republicans took poſſeſſion of Aix-la-chapelle.

An action took place on the twentieth near Clermont between the republicans and the Auſtrian rear guard. The diſcrepancy of offical accounts was very remarkable on this occaſion. Clairfait ſtated the loſs of the French at two thouſand men. Gillet the French commiſſioner ſtated it to be only nine killed and twelve wounded. The French appear to have been repulſed according to the Auſtrian account.

Clairfait was not ſuffered to repoſe at Juliers, where he had taken a poſition with great military addreſs behind the Roer; on the twenty-ninth Jourdan croſſed that river from Aix-la-chapelle, and attacked the extenſive Auſtrian poſts at once from Ruremonde to Juliers and Duren. The action laſted during the whole of the twenty-ninth and thirtieth of September, and was renewed on the firſt and ſecond of October. The obſtinacy of the action is indicated by its duration, but on the third of October Clairfait no longer able to reſiſt, and having loſt at leaſt 10,000 men, took advantage of a fog early on that morning to make a precipitate retreat. In the courſe of this action the republicans attacked the uncommonly ſtrong works on the mountain of Merznich, defended by twenty-four pounders. Repulſed in each aſſault, they returned to the charge with renewed vigor, and at length carried the fortifications. Seven regiments of Auſtrians ſuffered ſeverely, and three battallions of Hulans were annihilated. Juliers immediately ſurrendered at diſcretion. The arſenal was well provided, ſixty pieces of cannon and fifty thouſand pounds of gun-powder were found there.

The retreat of the Auſtrians was nearly as diſaſtrous as the defeat. They were purſued cloſely, and the French accounts ſtate, that from four to five thouſand were ſlain, and ſeven hundred taken priſoners. The Dutch accounts ſtate the whole loſs of the allies in the battle and the flight at 13,000, a ſtatement probably more exact. Clairfait did not halt long at Cologn, but ſoon after croſſed the Rhine, to the banks of which he was purſued by the republicans, who, as the rear of the Auſtrians were paſſing the river derided them by aſking if that was the road to Paris? In alluſion to the gaſconade of the allies at the commencement of the war.

The French entered Cologn on the ſixth of October, the people preſſing to ſee them with congratulations and embraces, and expreſſing themſelves in the moſt unequivocal tokens of admiration of their valour and joy at their arrival. The magiſtrates had previouſly ſent a deputation to the French general, requeſting that no light troops might be admitted within the walls, which was granted, and the general entered at the head of only four thouſand men. Their conduct was ſuitable to their character and the generous joy expreſſed at their arrival. None of the inhabitants left the city, and perſons and property were as much reſpected as in the moſt profound peace; and the magiſtrates and the clergy were left in the indiſturbed exerciſe of their functions.

Venloo and Nuys ſubmitted in conſequence of theſe victories, and many loaded veſſels on the rivers fell into the poſſeſſion of the conquerors. On the morning of the ſeventh of October fifty French chaſſeurs entered Bonn, and were followed in the evening by three thouſand more. The committee of public ſafety had ſignified a wiſh to Jourdan that he ſhould ſend ſome troops againſt Coblentz, a place peculiarly obnoxious to the French from having been the focus of the emigrant conſpiracies at no remote period. About the middle of the month general Moreau with his diviſion was detached thither; and on the twenty-ſecond he arrived at Andernach, where he met ſome of the enemy's huſſars, charged them, killed ſeveral and took fifty priſoners, with the loſs only of three men. On the following day he appeared before Coblentz. The redoubts were carried by the infantry by direct aſſault, while the cavalry turned the enemy's flanks, and the Auſtrians retreated precipitately acroſs the Rhine. This important place did not coſt the republic a drop of blood.

While the armies of the Sambre and Meuſe were thus approaching the important fortreſs of Mentz, the army of the Rhine were victorioufly advancing to the ſame point from the oppoſite ſide. On the ſeventeenth of October Frankendal ſubmitted to the republicans, and on the following day they entered in triumph the epiſcopal city of Worms. The army of the Moſelle about the ſame time took Bingen, and from this time Mentz may be conſidered as in a ſtate of ſiege.

After the retreat of the Engliſh from Boxtel, they took a poſition at Grave; the duke of York was again compelled to change his poſition by the defeat of the Auſtrians on the Roer, and throwing a regiment into Grave, retreated and encamped under the walls of Nimeguen.

The army under Pichegru was at this period in much need of proviſions; even bread was brought from Antwerp acroſs the heaths of Brabant. It was alſo neceſſary, before they ſhould croſs the Meuſe, that ſome place of ſtrength on the oppoſite ſide of the river ſhould be obtained to ſerve as a point of ſupport; for there were few horſes and no carriages and the roads were bad.

Bois-le-duc was the place moſt ſuitable, but it was peculiarly difficult of acceſs; it was ſurrounded by a number of ſmall forts, in excellent condition, well garriſoned; and the country was inundated to the extent of three hundred toiſes from the ramparts, ſo that the place ſeemed to be a ſtupenduous fortreſs in the midſt of a great lake. Though the walls might be breached, all the faſcines in the world would not have been ſufficient to reach it. In addition to this and the badneſs of the roads, the battering train was at a conſiderable diſtance Notwithſtanding all theſe obſtacles it was determined to commence the ſiege, and the place was inveſted on the 23d of September by the republican cavalry, and the next day by the infantry.

But previous to commencing the ſiege, it was expedient to reduce Crevecœur on the Meuſe, as it defended Sluys on that river, and was of great importance. Some batteries were erected, and it ſurrendered to general Delmas on the 29th of September; it mounted thirty-eight pieces of cannon, and there were found in it one thouſand muſquets and thirty thouſand pounds of powder. This place rendered the French maſters of the inundation.

The rains had now commenced, and adding to the inundation, the ſiege appeared more difficult. The trenches were at a great diſtance. The place was commanded by a prince of Heſſe, who it appears had fortified his houſe and covered it over with turf to avoid the dangers attending the bombardment; but after a few ſhot were fired, he capitulated on the 10th of October; the garriſon conſiſting of two thouſand five hundred men were allowed the honors of war, but were bound not to ſerve until individually exchanged. The republicans took a hundred and forty-ſix pieces of cannon, a hundred and ſeven of which were braſs, a hundred and thirty thouſand pounds of powder, an immenſe quantity of iron ſhot, and nine thouſand fuſees. Four hundred and eight emigrants were alſo taken here. Thus two places before which Louis the XIV. loſt ſixteeen thouſand men without taking them, were taken in fifteen days by the republicans, and with field pieces only, for the battering artillery did not arrive until after the capitulation. After the capture of this place Pichegru demanded leave to retire from the command for a ſhort time, in conſequence as he alledged of a cutaneous diſeaſe, the effect of fatigue. Other cauſes were, however, aſſigned, but his popularity ſtifled them. Moreau was appointed his ſucceſſor, he who conquered Ypres, Nieuport, Sluys, and Cadſand.

Pichegru appears however, not to have quitted the neighbourhood of the army immediately, as in a diſpatch dated at Poſthick, October 20th, he mentions the action of the 19th between the Meuſe and the Waal at Puffleck only as a ſkirmiſh. The duke of York has given an account of this affair in another view, conſiderably in detail, and it appears to have been an action of much importance. He ſays that on the morning of the 19th the French attacked the whole of the advanced poſts on his right wing in great force; and that the poſt on the left of the Engliſh 37th regiment, occupied by a detachment of Rohan huſſars being forced, the Engliſh regiment was compelled to retreat upon the dyke along the Waal, where being attacked by a body of French huſſars, the whole of the regiment excepting the major and 50 men, was cut to pieces. General Fox in attempting to rally the 37th regiment was taken priſoner by a French huſſar, but his horſe being in better condition than the Frenchman's he took an opportunity to make uſe of his fleetneſs, and eſcaped. The military character of the French was highly conſpicuous at this period; the roads through which they had to paſs were compoſed of a ſtiff clay, the rains were thick and conſtant, and heavy fogs conſtantly prevailed. Prior to this action at Puffleck they had been four days without bread, and had not even been able to dreſs their ordinary repaſt of ſoup for forty-eight hours. In theſe circumſtances murmurs might have been expected, but on the contrary their only anxiety was to meet the enemy.

The French officers have conferred great praiſe on the Engliſh military diſpoſitions at this place. But notwithſtanding that the ground was interſected by dykes, over which the Engliſh had laid bridges to ſecure their retreat, and which they broke down as they paſſed, their efforts were unavailing This engagement had a great influence on the affairs of the campaign; Pichegru in his accounts of the actions of this period gives only the reſult; this has been urged by an apologiſt of his as a matter of prudence from his diſlike of the committee of public ſafety. A leſs honorable motive has been aſſigned; he continued during this period at Bruſſels, but correſponded with Jourdan and Moreau. In the action of Puffleck the republicans were commanded by Souham and Bonneau. The chief of brigade Bonhomme it was that with the ninth regiment of huſſars, the thirtieh diviſion of gendarmerie, and the firſt battalion of light infantry, performed the ſignal action wherein the thirty-ſeventh Engliſh regiment were cut to pieces. The general of brigade Jardon it was that attacked the Rohan emigrants and cut them to pieces, to the amount of three hundred, and took ſixty-nine of them priſoners. The French took in this affair ſix hundred other priſoners and four pieces of cannon. This action and the movements on the Meuſe between Ruremond and Venloo obliged the duke of York to paſs the Waal, leaving behind general Walmoden to cover Nimeguen. This was now the only poſt from which the allies could advance upon the republicans, and it was therefore reſolved to take it, in order to ſecure the poſitions of the two armies on the Rhine and Waal, of covering the ſiege of Grave, and placing the troops in ſafe and commodious cantonments.

On the twenty-eighth of October that place was partially inveſted and detachments poſted at Wickham and Boningen completed the inveſtment of Grave. Meanwhile general Laurent with only four thouſand laid ſiege to Venloo. He commenced by opening his trenches at one hundred toiſes from the covered way; diſconcerted by this boldneſs and by a ſevere repulſe in a ſortie, the garriſon ſurrendered on the twenty-ſeventh of October. Generals Mareſcot and Dijean of the engineers, and Heblé of the artillery, diſtinguiſhed themſelves in theſe ſieges.

In order to complete the inveſtment of Nimeguen, it was neceſſary to poſſeſs the left bank of the Waal, the Engliſh army had poſſeſſed themſelves of it to the amount of 38,000 men, and the communication with Nimeguen was open to them by a bridge of boats, as well as a flying bridge, with which they could throw ſuccours into the place at pleaſure. The fortifications were in the beſt condition, and the advanced works were furniſhed with heavy cannon and mortars. Theſe works or lines covered the ramparts, and were in fact an entrenched camp. Beſides which, the place was induſtriouſly ſurrounded with a circular line of trous de loup, or ditches very wide and deep with ſharp ſtakes planted at the bottom, and filled with branches of trees, covered with looſe earth on the ſurface, by which cavalry were wholly prevented from acting.

To drive the Engliſh from their poſition it was neceſſary to paſs the Waal with 30,000 men, and the difficulties in the attempt were great, as the inundation might cut off ſuch a corps from the main body. On the twenty-ſeventh of October the French made a ſlight attack without ſucceſs on the Engliſh out-poſts. On the night of the fourth of November a ſortie was made by the garriſon; the party was conſiderable, conſiſting of Dutch, Hanoverians, and Engliſh, led by major general De Burgh. The French either penetrated or had intelligence of their deſign, for they received the allies ſo warmly, that they drove them in with terrible ſlaughter, and the commandant of the party was wounded.

On the morning of the ſixth, the French opened a very heavy battery on each extremity of the half moon in which the troops were formed, and both of theſe fired upon the bridge of boats and flying bridge. Several of the boats were accordingly ſunk. This ſucceſs of the artillery alarmed the Engliſh for their ſafety; however, in the night of the eighth the bridge being repaired the duke of York withdrew from the town, and drawing the bridge after him to the right ſide of the river burnt it, and left the Dutch to defend themſelves, amounting to two thouſand five hundred men under general De Burgh.

The confuſion and diſtreſs of the Dutch troops is not to be deſcribed. Too weak of themſelves, even to man the poſts, they fell into diſorder; part of them ſeized the flying bridge and embarked on it, but the cable by which it was worked was cut by the French ſhot, the bridge ſwung round again to the city. At this moment the French had entered the city, and they proceeded to ſeize the bridge and make the Dutch priſoners. Theſe unfortunate people always the dupes and the objects of hatred of the Engliſh, already perfidiouſly deſerted, and the bridge withdrawn from them and burnt by their good and princely ally were ſtill further cruelly fired upon by the Engliſh ſoldiers! The French general Souham, with a generoſity which forms a remarkable contraſt with this conduct of the Engliſh, on entering the place felt only anxious for the ſafety of the priſoners, taken as it was by aſſault, the town might have been, according to the uſages of war, delivered up to pillage; he therefore aſſembled the abandoned Dutch, and made a form of capitulation conſiſting of one article, which declared the garriſon ſhould lay down their arms on the glacis, and be made priſoners of war; but what renders this conduct yet more magnanimous was the condition of the French troops, an uninterrupted ſervice of ſeven months had reduced their clothing to a miſerable ſtate, they were literally covered with rags; their ſhoes, and ſtockings were generally worn out, and the cold already ſevere, and the weather conſtantly wet or miſty; it was not uncommon to ſee the French ſentinels with the ſleeves of their coats hanging in ſhreds, without hats or caps, and their heads covered with their haverſacks, or the little bags in which they uſually carried their neceſſaries. This deſcription extended to all the armies.

Philipine on the Scheldt and Sas-de-gand, both ſurrendered to the diviſions under the command of Michaud on the 23d of October.

The ſiege of Maeſtricht, which had been formed ſoon after the defeat of the Auſtrian general Latour, was carried on ſlowly at firſt; on the 22d of September they croſſed the Meuſe near the town, and blockaded it on the ſide of Wyk. On the 26th Kleber formally ſummoned the town; on the 28th a body of Auſtrian cavalry made a ſortie, and took a piece of cannon; on the 2d of October they made a ſecond attempt of a ſimilar kind, but were ſeverely repulſed. The republicans then began to break ground, and conſtructed batteries on the heights of St. Peter, a third ſortie was attempted on the 9th, which partly ſucceeded; but by the 11th the batteries were eſtabliſhed, as well as ſome formidable works on the Limberg over againſt the mountain. On the 20th the French park was encreaſed by thirty pieces of battering cannon. On the 23d they completed their firſt parallel, and commenced the ſecond. The town was again ſummoned on the 30th; and the trumpeter had hardly departed from the gate on his return, when the beſiegers opened all their batteries and poured a tremendous ſhower of ſhot and ſhells on the town. This continued without intermiſſion all the night. The atmoſphere was filled with balls, bombs, and howitzer ſhells; ſcarcely a place of ſafety was left in the whole circuit of the city; a number of private and public buildings were demoliſhed. Three days were paſſed in this diſtreſſing ſituation amidſt the groans of the wounded and dying, when the governor moved by the entreaties of the magiſtrates entered into a negociation, and the place capitulated on the 4th of November, eleven days after the trenches had been opened. It is one of the ſtrongeſt fortreſſes in Europe; it coſt Louis XIV. thirteen days to take this place, and Louis XV. three weeks to take it. On thoſe occaſions the greateſt poets and painters of France celebrated the glory of the capture; but Kleber is a republican general, and the actions of the armies and the generals have been ſo many and extraordinary, that the ordinary means of celebrating them are found inadequate to the end, and the world is left to wonder without being able to deſcribe the objects of their admiration in adequate terms. Mareſco was the beſieging engineer, Bellemont commanded the artillery. It was the intention of Kleber to have ſtormed the place on the 4th. The garriſon conſiſted of five thouſand ſix hundred Auſtrians, two hundred huſſars, and one thouſand five hundred Dutch troops. More than two thouſand buildings were damaged or deſtroyed by the bombardment, twelve thouſand bombs, balls, and ſhells had been thrown into the town, ſome of the bombs weighing two hundred weight. It was about this period that Coblentz and Rhienfeld were taken by the right wing of the army of Jourdan; that the army of the Rhine entered the Palitinate; and Mentz alone remained in poſſeſſion of the allies along the whole courſe of the Rhine!

The ſtate of the republican ſoldiers in point of equipments and comfort at this time has been noticed; and it became neceſſary that they ſhould at leaſt enjoy ſome repoſe having ſecured a ſtrong line from which no force of the enemy could diſlodge them. With ſome difficulty a ſhort reſpite from their toils were agreed upon, while plans of a more daring and ſplendid kind were on the eve of being developed and executed by thoſe youthful veterans.

At this interval it will be opportune to take up briefly the progreſs of the republican arms in Spain and Italy; and to advert to the circumſtances of the French affairs in the Weſt-Indies.

The army of the Eaſtern Pyrenees, under Doppeto marched from Puycerda for Campredon on the fourteenth of June, where, after carrying Tonges and Ribes, he eſtabliſhed his head-quarters on the ſeventeenth. On the twenty-firſt he advanced to Riſpell, where the Spaniards had a manufactory of arms, a large quantity of which the French general added to his ſtores. During which time the ſiege of Belegarde continued to be cloſely preſſed. A bold attempt was made on the thirteenth of Auguſt by the Count de l'Union for the relief of that place. The republicans were at firſt forced, but rallying they regained the heights from which they had been diſlodged, and the Spaniards ſuffered a total defeat, leaving two thouſand five hundred dead on the field. The French loſt one hundred and eighty ſeven killed and ſix hundred wounded, among the former was a brave and active officer general Mirabel.

Bellegarde being thus deprived of relief, ſubmitted to general Dugommier on the twentieth of the following month. The garriſon conſiſted of ſix thouſand men. On the next day the Count de l'Union made another attack on the French hoping to diſlodge them, not knowing that they were poſſeſſed of the place; but he was ſeverely repulſed, having loſt ſix hundred men and four pieces of cannon.

General Dugommier concluded his carreer in this quarter by a ſignal victory over the Spaniards and emigrants at Spouilles. The ſlaughter of the latter was terrible, but one thouſand Spaniards and Portugueſe obtained quarter by ſurrendering priſoners of war. The republicans took a large quantity of cannon, and tents and camp equipage for twelve thouſand men. The brave general Dugommier was killed by a ſhell upon the black mountain which he had aſcended the better to direct the military operations. His death was ſeverely avenged on the twentieth, when his valiant opponent the count de l'Union with three other Spaniſh generals were killed in an action near St. Fernando de Figueres. For the defence of this poſt the Spaniards had ſpent ſix months in erecting from eighty to one hundred batteries mounted with heavy cannon. The force in them amounted to 40,000 men ſtrongly entrenched; yet they were attacked by the republicans, and after two hours completely carried. The fort of St. Fernando was then attacked and ſurrendered on the third day, and the garriſon of nine thouſand men were made priſoners of war. The French found in the fort one hundred and ſeventy pieces of cannon, five thouſand ſtand of arms, twelve founderies for cannon, and an immenſe quantity of ammunition. The towns Aſcoita and Aſpatea ſoon after ſubmitted; and in the courſe of a few days another victory was announced to the convention, in which five hundred priſoners, one braſs cannon (the only one which the Spaniards had not loſt before), were captured.

The army of the Weſtern Pyrenees was not leſs ſucceſsful. In the latter end of July the redoubt of Maria Louiſa, the camp of St. Jean de Luz, and the fort of St. Barbe were ſtormed and carried in one day, by the republican general of diviſion Delaforde. The villages of Bera and Leſſaca were alſo taken at the ſame time with abundant granaries. Theſe however formed but a prelude to a ſtill greater victory; for on the firſt of Auguſt 15,000 Spaniards poſted near the village of Haya fled before a body of 6,000 French. By this retreat immenſe magazines, 2,000 muſkets, ſix ſtand of colours, 200 cannon and howitzers, tents for 25,000 men, and 2,000 priſoners, among whom were two entire regiments who grounded their arms, fell into the hands of the republicans. On the evening of the ſame day Fontarabia which guards the entrance of Spain, and which coſt the duke of Berwick 8,000 men, was taken after a very ſhort conflict by a detachment of the republicans. The following day a ſingle diviſion commanded by general Moncey, ſeized the port of the Paſſage. On the third of Auguſt St. Sebaſtian was inveſted, and capitulated on the ſucceeding morning. The garriſon conſiſting of two thouſand men, and more than one hundred and eighty pieces of cannon were taken, with a conſiderable quantity of proviſions and ſtores, and after the ſurrender of the place two Spaniſh ſhips laden with powder and ball, wine and codfiſh entered the port, and became an uſeful addition to the captures. The ſame good conduct which characteriſed the French armies in other places was viſible here. The commiſſioner iſſued a proclamation declaring that no act of plunder by any perſon whatever would be permitted to go unpuniſhed, and that religious worſhip ſhould be guaranteed to all perſons.

While Moncey advanced againſt St. Sebaſtian, another diviſion under generals Fregeville and Laborde proceeded againſt the Spaniſh poſts at Ernain; but the Spaniards, diſheartened by defeats ſo inceſſant, fled without making reſiſtance. The French after theſe victories extended their advanced poſts as far as Toloſa. In the beginning of September the Spaniards again began to rally, but on the firſt attack ſix thouſand of them were repulſed by a picquet of only ſix hundred. At the ſame period 150 of the Walloon guards deſerted to the French.

In the beginning of October the Spaniards were again ſignally defeated. A line of poſts had been eſtabliſhed upwards of forty leagues in extent; the French did not wait to be attacked, but aſſailed theſe poſts in twelve different points at the ſame time. The Spaniards were entrenched on elevated ground and ſtrongly fortified, but all their defences near Beddaditz, Cubeg, and Villeneuva, were carried by the bayonet, and the works which they had laboured for twelve months in conſtructing were utterly deſtroyed. It was the French general's deſign to have ſurrounded the whole Spaniſh army, but one of the columns arrived too late, and the Spaniards favoured by a thick fog were enabled to make good their retreat to Sangonella, with the loſs of 2500 killed and an equal number taken priſoners.

Amidſt theſe accumulated diſtreſſes, the cabinet of Spain muſt have been ſenſibly alarmed. The expectation of the French marching to Madrid was ſtrongly entertained, and the court had made diſpoſitions for a removal. Efforts were however made and with the ſame ſucceſs that had been experienced in Germany and Holland to raiſe the people in a maſs. The loſſes of proviſions and warlike ſtores ſtruck deeply into the Spaniſh reſources, and extraordinary means were neceſſarily reſorted to, to ſupply them. The cabinet exhibited the rare example of diſintereſted ſtateſmen actually relinquiſhing in the month of September twenty-five per cent. of their official income, comprehending placemen and penſioners of every deſcription. A large ſum was alſo levied on the opulent clergy, and it was determined— "That no miniſter or other perſon ſhould enjoy more than one ſalary, though he might hold various offices". Such inſtances are rare under corrupt governments. Early in this month, however, the Spaniſh cabinet ſaw the neceſſity of ſeeking a peace with the republic, the method taken was by the tranſmiſſion of a private letter from Gardoqui the Spaniſh miniſter of the finnces, by a flag of truce through the two armies, to James Monroe the American miniſter at Paris. This overture was an indirect one, but was followed by others more open and nnequivocal, which ſubſeqnently terminated in a negociation.

The king of Sardinia had alſo adopted the project of raiſing the people in a maſs, but with a degree of ſucceſs that fully juſtified the ſagacity of the king of Pruſſia on that ſubject; in the month of July ten thouſand Piedmonteſe of this deſcription were diſperſed by a few battalions of French; and on the 14th of September the Piedmonteſe were again defeated with terrible ſlaughter by the army of the Alps.

The allies, however, expected by a plan they had formed to annihilate the French in that quarter. A conſiderable force was collected, and it was intended to attack at once all the French poſts in the vicinity of Genoa, and afterwards Genoa itſelf: The French anticipated this plan, carried the Auſtrian and Sardinian poſts with the bayonet, purſued them to Alexandria, and forced them to evacuate Le Caize with conſiderable loſs. The war on the part of the Auſtrians and Sardinians was defenſive during the following month.

The importance of the European hiſtory civil and military was ſo ſupereminent, that in tracing all its various and complex parts, it was neceſſary in order to avoid confuſion to defer the tranſactions in the Weſt-Indies to a period leſs embarraſſed. Early in February the Britiſh fleet and army under admiral Jervis and general Grey ſailed from Carliſle-bay, Barbadoes, to attack Martinico. Before the ſixteenth of March the whole iſland was in poſſeſſion of the Engliſh, excepting the forts of Bourbon and Royal, which ſurrendered on the twenty-third. At the former of theſe general Rochambeau commanded, (the ſon of the veteran, who in conjunction with general Waſhington took Cornwallis at Yorktown). The Engliſh commander in his diſpatch ſays, that ſo gallant was the defence of this officer at fort Bourbon that ' ſcarcely an inch of ground was untouched by the ſhot and ſhells of the beſiegers.'

The French troops engaged not to ſerve againſt the allies during the war, and veſſels were to be provided for the general and his ſuite to return to France; general Rochambeau wiſhed to ſecure their freedom to the ſlaves that had been liberated, but the Engliſh general would not admit of it, and had them returned to their former ſtate of ſervitude. The profligacy of this meaſure as well as its repugnance to all religious and civil obligations, was ſuitably repaid by the juſt hatred which it inſpired in the hearts of the unfortunate blacks. About the ſame time Cape Tiburon in St. Domingo was reduced by colonel Whitlock, and a conſiderble quantity of ſtores and ordnance was taken; the pariſhes of Jean Rabel, St. Marc, Archaye, Roncaſin, and Leogane in the ſame iſland ſubmitted to commodore Ford. Shortly afterwards the poſt of L'Acul ſix miles from Leogane, which was garriſoned with about ſix hundred men, was taken by ſtorm by colonel Whitlock. A tranſaction took place between this officer and the French general Lavaux, which exhibits the character of the two nations, in a very conſpicuous point of view. Lavaux commanded at Port au Paix, and in a letter of date the ninth of February Whitlock addreſſes him in the following terms;—"I now therefore in the name of his Britannic majeſty, do hereby offer you the ſame protection, on condition that the fort of Port au Paix and its dependencies are put into the poſſeſſion of the Britiſh government, which being complied with, the officers and ſoldiers ſerving under your command ſhall enjoy the ſame favours as have been granted to thoſe of the Mole, leaving it to the bounty of his majeſty to grant to yourſelf the rank he ſhall judge proper: I further add, that as a reward for the confidence which I demand of you in the name of the government which I ſerve, the ſum of five thouſand crowns (ecus) Tournois ſhall be paid to you in perſon or depoſited in the bank of England payable to your order, on delivering the town of Port au Paix, with the forts, artillery, ammunition, proviſions, &c. as alſo the ſhips of war which may be in the port. I ſhall be at Leogane next Wedneſday, where any flag of truce you ſhall pleaſe to ſend me ſhall be received and reſpected." ſuch was the propoſition of his Britannic majeſty's commander. The following is ſo much as relates to this ſubject on the part of the republican.

After ſtating his purpoſe to maintain his duty to his country, he ſays—" Permit me now to complain to yourſelf of the indignity you have offered me in thinking me ſo vile, ſo flagitious, ſo baſe, as not to reſent an offer of five thouſand crowns. In this you have wronged yourſelf. I am a general; hitherto I have been worthy to command the army. You have endeavoured to diſhonor me in the eyes of my comrades; this is an offence between you and me, for which you owe me ſatisfaction; I demand it in the name of honor, which muſt exiſt among all nations. Therefore previous to any general action I offer you ſingle combat till either of us falls, leaving to you the choice of arms, either on foot or on horſeback; then, if victorious, I ſhall have proved myſelf worthy to command republicans; if I fall glorioufly, the republican army will have another leader ſtill more formidable, and every individual in the army will imitate my example. Your quality of enemy in the name of your nation, did not give you a right to offer me a perſonal inſult; as a private perſon I aſk ſatisfaction for an injury done by an individual.

" Our nations have often made war, but always with equl weapons; ceaſe then to attack us by bribery. Let us be equally generous, and let us contend in honourable hoſtility; we ſcorn the mean arts of ſeduction. The enemy made priſoner of war with arms in his hands, commands reſpect, as he merits eſteem. The univerſe has its eyes upon us; the univerſe will ſay,—there ſtill exiſt men who preferred death to diſhonour; we ſhall ſerve as examples to all military men, and your country itſelf will teſtify its approbation. We have always before our eyes the proverb which ſays—'The treaſon pleaſes us well, but we deteſt the traitor."

This anſwer is in itſelf a ſufficient commentary on the diſgraceful conduct of the Engliſh commander; it appears however, that the ſhame does not reſt wholly with him, but with his government, by whom he was authoriſed to do ſo. Indeed the mode of warfare was not confined to that iſland or that occaſion, but was extended to ſeveral other iſlands with more ſucceſs; as ſeveral places were betrayed into the hands of the Engliſh. Indeed if the manner of conducting the Engliſh government for a century paſt is conſidered, it will ceaſe to be wondered at that corruption which is the vital principle of its exiſtence ſhould pervade and inflict all its remoteſt members. The nation has been frequently held up as an aſſemblage of uſurers and ſharpers, and it cannot be diſputed that however reſpectable the few exceptions may be, that exiſt in oppoſition to that character, that too many facts have ariſen not only in the preſent war but in that of America. An Engliſh writer has very judiciouſly obſerved, that an attempt to bribe a member of congreſs did more miſchief to the Engliſh cauſe in America than the worſt military conduct could have affected. The ſelf-reſpect of a nation or a government muſt be deplorably low indeed that deſcends to ſuch abject means of warfare, as that of bribing a public officer. But England has found her Arnolds, though ſhe failed of a Levaux.

The reduction of Martinico was no ſooner effected than the troops were ſent againſt St. Lucia, which ſurrendered on the 4th of April, and the troops were re-embarked the next day for Martinico; here they were put on board tranſports from the ſhips of war, and on the 8th were detached againſt the iſlands of the Saints, which they took. On the 10th they appeared off Point-a-Petre, Guadaloupe, and on the 11th landed in Goſier-bay, and on the 12th the ſtrong poſt Fleur d'Epee was taken by ſtorm. This ſucceſs put the Engliſh in poſſeſſion of Grand Terre, which was followed on the 20th by the ſurrender of Baſſeterre by a capitulation which included Guadaloupe, Marigalante, Deſirada, and all the dependencies. The terms the ſame as thoſe at Martinico.

From a return found among the papers of the French general Collot, it appears that the number of perſons able to bear arms in Guadaloupe, was five thouſand eight hundred and ſeventy-ſeven, and that the number of arms delivered out to them was four thouſand and forty-four. The Engliſh general having garriſoned theſe places returned to Martinico. Theſe rapid ſucceſſes, however, were ſoon, and ſeverely checked; the force originally ſent out was not ſufficient to afford full garriſons and make due allowances for the loſs by the habitual intemperance and debauchery of the Engliſh ſoldiery, and the diſeaſes of the climate. On the 3d of June a French fifty gun ſhip, a forty gun ſhip armed en flute, a frigate, and three tranſports appeared off Guadaloupe, and manifeſted an intention to attack Fleur l'Epee. On the 5th they landed thirteen boats crowded with troops, and carried the fort by ſtorm, the Engliſh garriſon retreating with loſs to Fort Louis, which was ſoon evacuated alſo, and the Engliſh garriſon retired to Baſſeterre. The French were commanded by Victor Hugues, a commiſſioner from the convention, who ſeems to have been a man of uncommon enterprize and courage, and of a capacity that embraced with addreſs and facility all the details of civil and military affairs; he made the beſt arrangements for maintaining his ſucceſs and driving the enemy out of the iſland. Conformably to the celebrated decree. he proclaimed freedom to all the negroes, equipped and clothed a large body of them, and with as many of the mulattoes as he found attached to the French cauſe, well armed, practiſed them daily in diſcipline. The Engliſh general Grey was not inattentive to the enterprizing republican, and collecting a force rapidly embarked at St. Kitts and landed on the 19th of June at Guadaloupe, under cover of an Engliſh fleet. Hugues met him in ſeveral rencontres with his new raiſed corps; the Engliſh gained ſome ſlight victories, but the others gained diſcipline; the Engliſh troops were ſinking under the heat of the climate, and the rainy ſeaſon was now coming in; the Engliſh general therefore determined on a deſparate attempt to cloſe the campaign. On the 2d of July he detached a body of grenadiers, light infantry, and ſeamen, to take Point-a-Petre by ſurprize, they entered the town and ſuddenly a number of guns were opened on them with grape ſhot which cut them down in all directions; they were aſſailed at the ſame time by vollies from the houſes, a retreat became indiſpenſable, and it was affected with the loſs of eight hundred and ſixty men, their commanding officer colonel Symes wounded; colonel Gomm, and captain Robertſon of the navy killed. Grey having thus been fruſtrated, took meaſures for the defence of Baſſeterre and embarked the remainder of his troops in the night, leaving the French in poſſeſſion of the iſland, except Baſſeterre, which made a long reſiſtance, that will be noticed in the tranſactions of the next year.

The conduct of the Engliſh commanders in their magiſterial capacity, exhibits traits of diſgraceful perfidy that is but too conſiſtent with the whole conduct of their government, and on this occaſion deſerves to be particularly expoſed for the execration of all poſterity. General Grey is the ſame perſon who diſtinguiſhed himſelf in the American revolution for his nightly cold-blooded maſſacres of the young and old and innocent and unoffending, in common with the hoſtile armed American. Soon after the arrival of general Grey and admiral Jervis in the Weſt-Indies, they iſſued a proclamation dated the 1ſt of January 1794, on board the Boyne, addreſſed to the inhabitants of Martinico, wherein they "invite all the friends of peace, government, religion, and order in the iſland of Martinico, to ſhake off the yoke of a tyrannical oppreſſion, and to ſhelter themſelves from the terrors of anarchy under the protection and government of a juſt and benevolent ſovereign!—And by theſe preſents ſolemnly promiſe, grant, and inſure all thoſe, who availing themſelves of this invitation in a quiet and peaceable manner, ſhall ſubmit to the authority of the king, and put themſelves under his protection, perſonal ſafety, as well as the full and immediate enjoyment of all their lawful property, according to their ancient laws and cuſtoms." Language could not form a guarantee more explicit, ſolemn, and liberal, nor a temptation more ſtrong and ſeductive, where the prepoſſeſſions of the perſons addreſſed were already violently excited againſt the French revolution. It has been already ſeen with what eaſe and facility thoſe officers obtained the poſſeſſion of the iſland of Martinico and others. The oppoſition even on the part of the few republicans at that iſland laſted only twenty-three days, and their ſubjection coſt the Engliſh only thirty-four men. Guadaloupe held out only eight days and St. Lucia but three.

On the 10th of February an official order was iſſued from St. Pierre's, directing all merchants, factors, &c. &c. to deliver in, the next day, a full, exact, and true verified ſpecification of all the colonial property in their poſſeſſion, under pain of impriſonment and confiſcation of the goods.

On the tenth of May general Prefcot, then governor of Martinico, iſſued a proclamation in the name and under the authority of the Engliſh commanders, in which the inhabitants were required to " Chooſe repreſentatives, who were afterwards to meet on " Sunday the eigthteenth, and fix in an equitable manner a general contribution, (the amount " of which ſhall be made known to them) to be paid by all who poſſeſs property in the " colony, the commander in chief having decided that ſuch an arrangement would be more " convenient than a general confiſcation!"

On the twentieth of May another proclamation was iſſued under the ſame authority, in which it was ſaid that, no attention having been paid to that of the tenth, requiring repreſentatives to raiſe a ſum " adequate to the value of the conqueſt, deſtined to reward the " valour, to compenſate the exceſſive fatigue, and its conſequences ſickneſs and mortality, " and to make good the heavy expences incurred by the Britiſh officers, &c. who, " with matchleſs perſeverance, &c. atchieved the conqueſt of the iſland." A new arrangement was ordered, by which civil commiſſioners were to be appointed in the pariſhes, towns, and boroughs, to deliver exact liſts of the inhabitants, houſes, number of ſlaves, cattle, acres of land, and every other article of property; to demand all books of account belonging to French agents, and of all property of vacant ſucceſſion, and of all goods of perſons captured, killed, or baniſhed, and of all perſons reſident in France; the names of all perſons not diſpoſed to fulfil theſe purpoſes; and they conclude that it is their " firm reſolution to have this preſent meaſure fully executed; or in failure of it, " to avail themſelves of the power with which they are inveſted, to order and enforce a " general confiſcation." This proclamation was iſſued from on board the Boyne, and was dated in this remarkable ſtyle—" On board the Boyne in the year of our ſaviour, 1794!"

Such meaſures contraſted with the proclamation of the firſt of January, ſupercede every ſpecies of comment; they ſpeak for themſelves a leſſon of ſhame at which honor and juſtice recoil, and which muſt ſtigmatize the authors of it in the rolls of infamy for ever. The people thus treated, it is true, were traitors to their own country, and we learn from the evidence of general Bruce, an Engliſh officer on the ſpot, that ſuch was the diſpoſition of the people to the Engliſh government, that on their firſt appearance eight hundred of the planters took up arms and declared for them, and that on the inhabitants being called to take the oath of allegiance to the Engliſh government the concourſe was ſo great that numbers could not obtain admiſſion, and were obliged to go away without the opportunity to take it.

Upon theſe people, however, a ſum of 700,000 pounds ſterling was levied, and a ſum of 300,000 on their friends at St. Lucia. After ſuch conduct it can appear no longer wonderful that all confidence in England was loſt in the Weſt-Indies, and that the iſlands ſhould become as inimical to her government as the conduct of her officers was repugnant to all eſtabliſhed principles of juſtice or even of war. The wars of ſavage nations are images of thoſe paſſions by which the individuals are actuated, they are the ſudden ebullitions of rage and fury, of a ſullen revenge or a momentary ferocity; they have ſome motive of neceſſity or paſſion, and gratified, they as ſuddenly ſubſide; but to ſee civilized man, in the name of the author of his religion, entering upon the cool and phlegmatic deliberations of avarice, calculating upon the meaſure of injuſtice, and claiming praiſe for not paſſing to the extremes of atrocity, betraying all national faith, all obligations of confidence, the moſt ſolemn engagements and the moſt explicit guarantee, in the name too of the author of his religion, is ſuch a prodigy of turpitude as afflicts the heart, and ſuch as the cold-blooded malevolence and effrontery of modern ſtateſmen alone could perpetrate or ſanction.

From the ſcenes of ſuch villainy, the mind turns with ſome relief to the conſideration of that valorous heroiſm which nobly avenges on the tyranny of Europe, the wrongs with which it afflicts thoſe parts of the earth, that are unfortunately placed under its rule, or the ſcope of its influence.

In ſuſpending the relation of the military tranſactions of the French armies on the Rhine, the Meuſe, and the Waal, we left off at the fall of Maeſtricht and Nimeguen, the armies having then entered on a neceſſary but brief repoſe.

The poſition of the army on the frontier left the Dutch no hope of being able to prevent the conqueſt of the United Provinces, but in a reſource always fatal in its conſequences and which had not been reſorted to but in the greateſt extremity, an inundation. The gulph was open before them, but oppreſſion had become ſo exceſſive that a change of maſters could not be for the worſe. The power of the ſtadtholder and his adherents had the force of the law to ſupport it, and thoſe who ardently wiſhed for his overthrow, ſubmitted to an impoſing ſilence rather than encourage a civil war that might deprive them of the hopes which they now ſaw ſo near realization. The ſtadtholderian party, however, ſaw their danger, and when it was too late lamented the temerity of their chief by whoſe unhappy influence all their afflictions were created. A negociation which at an earlier period would have prevented all their ſorrows, and greater calamities which now impended, was in this moment as eagerly caught at as it had been formerly contemned.

Miſerable is that nation, where the individuals are indifferent to the conduct of their government, or adverſe to thought or reflection; where a blind confidence is repoſed in the perſons entruſted with the ſeducing and treacherous charms of power; where the meaſures of ſtateſmen are not watched with jealouſy and caution; where office and truſt are ſuppoſed to confer talents; where ſpecious pretences are held out to an indolent public, who ſuffer themſelves to be tamely deluded and cajoled by the moſt palpable ſophiſtry; and who only awake from their lethargy when they are on the verge of ruin. Such was the ſtate of the infatuated adherents of the ſtadtholder. The people of Frieſland were the firſt to feel their danger, and to ſee what they ought to have ſeen long before—the neceſſity of peace. In October, the ſtates of that province determined to acknowledge the French republic, to break their alliance with England, and to enter into a treaty of peace and alliance with France. In ſome other provinces the republican party were arouſed, and thought it time to act; ſeveral reſolutions hoſtile to the ſtadtholder and his government were paſſed. Even at Amſterdam ſo great was the popular ferment, that on the 17th of October, the ſtates of Holland publiſhed a proclamation prohibiting the preſenting of any petition upon public and political ſubjects, and popular meetings of the people upon any occaſion. No ſymptom can ſo ſtrongly mark the tyranny of a government as that which goes to deprive the people for whom government is ordained, from whom it ſprings, and to whom it belongs, from diſcuſſing and ſeeking redreſs of wrongs. It is always an indication of error and frequently of vice, when the people are precluded from a knowledge of their own affairs, and a ſtrong preſumptive evidence that the conduct of adminiſtration will not bear ſcrutiny. The ſtadtholder came to Amſterdam the latter end of October, privately; it was ſuppoſed to influence the deliberations of the ſtates, which he ſuppoſed were too much diſpoſed to peace. But theſe efforts proved in vain, the people awakened by danger, reflected, and inveſtigation is always fatal to corruption. In the beginning of November a bold and energetic petition was preſented to the magiſtrates by ſome inhabitants of Amſterdam, wherein it was urged that the ſudden and unexpected appearance of the hereditary prince of Orange (the ſtadtholder's eldeſt ſon) and the duke of York in that city, could have no other object than to influence the legiſlative deliberations, to induce them to conſent to admit Engliſh troops, and to open the ſluices in order to inundate the country; it concluded by deprecating theſe pernicious meaſures, and demanding a categorical anſwer concerning the object of thoſe viſitors, and the admiſſion of foreign troops. The perſons who preſented the petition were put under arreſt, and to add to the infatuation, it was acknowleged to be done at the requeſt of the Engliſh miniſter lord Malmſbury. The effect of this tyranny and the interference of the Engliſh, produced an univerſal diſquietude, and the patriots were of neceſſity ſoon releaſed.

The republicans were now at repoſe, and the allies without poſſeſſing their ſpirit were annoyed by ſimilar wants and the aggravating miſeries of a putrid diſeaſe; added to which their hoſpitals were ſo barbarouſly neglected that thouſands periſhed through the want of medicines, wine, clothing, and even of attendants. The debauched habits which are inſeparable from the conſtitution of the mercenary military eſtabliſhments of Europe, but particularly thoſe of England, expoſed them to all the inroads of diſeaſe; while they were ſtationed at Arnheim it was common to bury from thirty to forty a day, and few of thoſe who entered the hoſpitals ever returned thence.

The plan of invading Holland had been oppoſed with all the influence and induſtry of Pichegru; and he expected that the cutaneous diſorder which called him to Bruſſels for cure, would operate powerfully in ſupport of his reaſonings. The military committee were partial to a project ſuggeſted by general Daendals, a Dutch patriot who had been a lawyer and aſſumed the ſword. He was a man of vehemence and ardor, animated to enthuſiaſm in the cauſe of civil liberty. He ſuggeſted the paſſage of the Waal, and pledged himſelf for the ſucceſs of the enterpriſe. During the period of repoſe Daendels had orders to prepare for it, and he carried on his meaſures in ſilence. He had gradually collected a number of boats and rafts at Crevecœur and on the left ſide of the Meuſe, to tranſport troops to the iſland of Bommel; at Bois-le-duc were provided materials for a bridge; and not far from Kokerdum, a little above Nimeguen, were boats ſufficient for 300 infantry. On the ſeventh of December an attempt was made to croſs from Nimeguen, in order to divert the attention of the Engliſh. Another feint was made on the fort of St. André, while the main attack was directed againſt Bommel. At this point Daendals was employed, and it could not be in better hands ſince he was perfectly acquainted with the poſition. But he ſoon diſcovered that he could not then ſucceed, and the expedition was for the time delayed. The Engliſh ſtationed at the village of Lant fired at thoſe who croſſed at Nimeguen, and the feint intended from Kokerdum failed. On the night of the eleventh, the attempt was renewed with rather better, though not full ſucceſs. They croſſed the river above Nimeguen, and near the canal, to the number of about 5,000. A detachment of 200 at day-break of the twelfth, favoured by a thick fog ſurpriſed an Hanoverian piquet at Pannern, made a major priſoner, poſſeſſed themſelves of a battery, ſpiked three guns, threw a fourth into the river, and retired without the loſs of a man. A detachment that attempted to paſs at Emerick was leſs fortunate, the Auſtrians who occupied it, ſuffered them to reach the middle of the river, when ſuddenly opening their batteries they ſunk ſeveral boats, the remainder regained the ſhore with loſs. The party that paſſed to attack fort St. André were equally unfortunate; that poſt was occupied by emigrants, and their fire was ſo ſevere and well directed that the republicans were obliged to retire. The main attack was alſo abandoned upon a repreſentation of Daendels to Moreau, who ordered the troops to return. The winter had now become ſevere, but the French troops were kept conſtantly in exerciſe, and theſe petty enterpriſes were calculated to prepare them for the ſeverity of the ſeaſon. The committee of public ſafety had iſſued orders for the maintenance of the military operations during the winter, and the capture of Holland was declared to be indiſpenſibly neceſſary. On the fifteenth of December the froſt ſet in with unuſual rigor, and in the courſe of the week both the Meuſe and the Waal were frozen over. The thermometer was ſeventeen degrees below the freezing point.

Pichegru whoſe plan it had been to winter the troops on the ſide of the Waal, where they then lay, now thought expedient to join the army. And on the eighteenth ordered the diviſion under general Bonneau to form the blockade of Breda in conjunction with the diviſion of Lemaire; the inveſtment was completed on the twenty-eighth. Grave was likewiſe blockaded and afterwards ſurrendered. On the twenty-ſeventh and twenty-eighth of December, a ſtrong column of republicans compoſing part of the right wing croſſed the Meuſe on the ice, near the village of Driel, under Daendels and Oſten, and attacked the poſt and iſland of Bommel; ſtruck with terror at the appearance of the French in ſo ſevere a ſeaſon, the garriſon ſurrendered; and the garriſon of fort St. André followed its example. In a few days after the cold encreaſed to ſuch a degree, that the Waal above Nimeguen was ſo ſeverely frozen as to admit of any weight; and it was indeed a grand ſpectacle to ſee the republican army, infantry, cavalry, and artillery, manœuvring on the ice with the ſame facility as on the ſolid ground.

Poſterity will perhaps rank this among the many prodigies of this extraordinary war, that are ſo uncommon as to appear doubtful, and which almoſt reconcile the ages of fable. The fact however is notorious that the French army with all its equipages paſſed this great arm of the Rhine without either bridges or boats. They attacked the allies for an extent of above twelve leagues, from Nimeguen to beyond the Necker. The right wing, as before obſerved, were extended from Nimeguen to fort St. André, where they watched the motions of the allies, while the centre took Bommel-Waert and Langſtraal, and the left forced the lines of Breda; a hundred and twenty pieces of cannon, ſixteen hundred priſoners, two pair of colours and three hundred horſes were taken in one day. The iſland of Bommel is about five leagues in length and two in breadth, formed by the waters of the Meuſe and Waal; the Dutch garriſon endeavoured to eſcape acroſs the Waal, but were overtaken, and part of the regiments of Orange, Hohenloe, Frieſland, and a Swiſs corps were forced to ſurrender, and with ſix gun boats laden with baggage were taken.

The French without loſs of time proceeded to eſtabliſh themſelves between the Waal and the Leck, in the Tieler-Waert, and the allies were under the greateſt apprehenſions for Gorcum and Cullemberg.

The army of the allies were behind the Linge. The prince of Orange had his head quarters at Gorcum, and his army near the town. The Engliſh extended from Cullemberg, where the right wing was poſted, to Panerden which ſupported the left. Alvinzy with twenty-five thouſand Auſtrians in Engliſh pay, formed a line from Arnheim to Weſel.

It was determined by the allies in this poſition to attack the French; for this purpoſe a force amounting to ſix thouſand five hundred infantry and one thouſand cavalry under general David Dundas advanced in three columns; the right was ordered to keep its left wing to the river Vliet to turn Thuyl, and attacking the rear of that village cut off the retreat of the republicans, while the left and centre were to attack them by the dyke.

At Geldermalſen the right column under lord Cathcart ſtruck off from the reſt of the Engliſh troops, and general Dundas fell in at break of day on the thirtieth of December with the Heſſians near Wardenberg, and finding the French had precipitately abandoned that place during the night, immediately puſhed on to Thuyl, attacking that poſt with great impetuoſity, ſo that nothwithſtanding its natural ſtrength, the abbatis by which it was protected, the batteries of the town of Bommel which flanked the approach, and the conſiderable number of men that defended it, it was carried at the point of the bayonet, and the republicans were driven acroſs the river, with the loſs of four pieces of artillery and a number of men.

It is to be obſerved that the duke of York, whoſe ignorance and arrogance were of ſo much advantage to the French during his whole career, left the army before this affair, having embarked for England on the ſixth of December.

It was on the day that the above affair took place at Thuyl that Grave ſurrendered to the republicans. It was defended by general Bons, with great valour and perſeverance; he had declared in reply to a ſummons that he never would ſurrender while he had a ſhot, and he kept his word. It was computed that three thouſand and ſeventy ſhells had been thrown into the place by the beſiegers, and the whole town was reduced to a heap of aſhes. The capitulation was highly honorable to the beſieged and the beſiegers, particularly a ſtipulation in favour of the ſick and wounded; and in anſwer to a demand of the citizens to retain their property unmoleſted and without regard to political opinions the French general Salm replied--" the French make a duty of reſpecting property and opinions."

On the fourth of January the French again croſſed the Waal, with a very ſmall force; and the allies were unable to diſlodge them from their poſition, The allies held a counſel in which it was determined to retreat from all the poſitions on that river, the cannon were ſpiked, large quantities of ammunition deſtroyed, and on the fifth they fell back upon the Leck. Another ſmall action took place at Gildermanſen on the eighth, between eight hundred French and a body of Engliſh under general Dundas, the Engliſh claimed a victory, though they were compelled to retreat with the loſs of one hundred and fifty men. The two bodies repulſed each the other four ſeveral times in this action.

On the 9th the French brigade of general De Winter, another of the Dutch patriots, who in the year 1797, commanded as admiral the Dutch fleet; and the diviſion under the command of general M'Donald, a Scotch officer, took poſſeſſion of Thuyl, and puſhed their reconnoitring parties as far as Linge. General Salm poſted ſome troops at Geldermanden and Mattera. On the 10th, the brigades of generals Vandamme and Compere with the diviſion under Moreau, paſſed at Millenguen, and took a poſition at Pannerdin to cover the right of the army; Jourdan paſſed at Kokerdum-ſur-Gente and Reunier at Oie-ſur-Bommel. The ſucceſs of theſe corps facilitated the paſſage of M'Donald's brigade at Nimeguen, where the river having thawed he was obliged to employ boats, he entered the fort of Knoſſembourg, where he took a temporary poſition. The thaw continued during the 12th and 13th, and interrupted the communication with the troops that had not yet paſſed; but it recommenced on the 14th, and the troops generally croſſed the ice, amounting in all it was ſaid by the Engliſh accounts, to ſeventy thouſand men, and took a poſition on the Leck and Rhine.

Gorcum, that celebrated fortreſs which has been called the key of Holland, from the ſtrength of its works and the facility with which it can be inundated, ſtill remained in the hands of the allies. On the 14th the French made a general attack upon all the poſts of the allies between the Waal and the Rhine; the London-gazette on this occaſion ſtates that the French were repulſed, but the allies actually retreated under cover of the night with the utmoſt precipitation from the heights of Rhenen. At the ſame time general Walmoden's poſition was attacked near Arnheim, and the allies defeated in every quarter. And the whole retreated towards Devinther. Heuſden immediately ſurrendered to the French, and a negociation was propoſed for the ſurrender of the whole country. On the 15th the allies paſſed the celebrated lines of Greb, conſtructed in 1743-6, for the protection of Holland and Utrecht. On the 16th they marched towards Loonen, and on that day the celebrated city of Utrecht ſurrendered to the French; Arnheim was taken on the 18th by general Vandamme. The Britiſh troops had taken their departure by way of Amersfort towards Zutphen, on the evening of the 16th, and Rotterdam fell without reſiſtance on the 18th.

In the meantime the hereditary prince of Orange had abandoned Gorcum; the partizans of the Stadtholder were ſtruck with conſternation; the princeſs of Orange with the younger part of her family, plate, jewels, and moveables packed up, had eſcaped for England on the 15th. The Stadtholder and his eldeſt ſon did not leave Holland till the 19th, the former embarked with precipitation in a ſmall open boat with only three men, in which he effected a paſſage to Harwich in England; it was under the moſt imminent peril he eſcaped from the Hague, the populace having collected and determined to ſacrifice him as the author of their misfortunes, by involving them in Engliſh politics. The fidelity of a ſmall party of his body guard alone ſaved him, and they conducted him to Scheveling, only in time to procure the boat. The populace there alſo collected to oppoſe his flight, the guards fired upon them, ſeveral lives were loſt in the tumult that enſued, but the Stadtholder eſcaped.

On the ſeventeenth Dr. Kraayenhoff, one of the baniſhed patriots, arrived at Amſterdam with a letter from the French general to prepare the government for the reception of the French army. And on the nineteenth that important city was literally taken poſſeſſion of by thirty French huſſars. The tree of liberty was immediately planted in all the ſquares, the inhabitants unanimouſly mounted the national cockade, choſe a revolutionary committee principally compoſed of patriots perſecuted by the ſtadtholder. On the twentieth general Pichegru entered the metropolis at the head of five thouſand men, and was received by the inhabitants with great tokens of joy. To the immortal honor of the conquerors, great as their diſtreſs was, their whole deportment was ſuch as to produce the moſt cordial eſteem for them; not a drop of blood was ſhed nor any thing like perſecution for political opinion. The liberty and independence of the United Provinces was not left to be ſolicited, nor to be the effect of a treaty with the conquerors, their liberty was ſpontaneouſly and publicly proclaimed, and the citizens were called upon by a free and general election to appoint their own magiſtrates. A patriot was choſen mayor and twenty-one others elected repreſentatives in the ſtates.

General De Winter took poſſeſſion of Amersfort on the nineteenth. On the ſame day M'Donald took a poſition behind the lines of Greb. On the thirtieth Gertruidenberg capitulated to general Bonneau, who alſo took Dordrecht, paſſing over the famous lake of Brieſboch, on the ice. Naerden was taken on the twenty-ſecond, and on the twenty-third the Hague. On the ſame day Helvoetſluys; the allies left behind them ſix hundred French priſoners, who roſe upon and took eight hundred Engliſh, who were directly ſent into France.

Leyden and Haerlem followed the example of Amſterdam, and on the eighteenth the burghers of Leyden demanded the re-eſtabliſhment of the city guards which had been diſbanded on the Pruſſian uſurpation in 1789, which was granted. Fluſhing, Middleburg, and the whole iſland of Walchern ſurrendered on the thirtieth,

The left of the army of the Sambre and Meuſe, which had quitted Pruſſian Guelders and entered Arnheim, formed a line from Amersfort to Naarden, on the Zuyder-Zee. Here the cavalry and light artillery marched over the ice and actually captured ſeveral Dutch ſhips of war. The Dutch admiral Storey appears to have acted in concert with the French at Middlebourg, two French commiſſioners were diſpatched from Cadſand, and went on board the Dutch admiral's ſhip, and the tri-color flag was immediately hoiſted with the loudeſt acclamations; the admiral then proceeded with the commiſſioners to take poſſeſſion of Middlebourg. Breda and Williamſtadt had opened their gates to the beſiegers. Bergen-op-Zoom with a garriſon of four thouſand men, including the eighty-ſeventh Engliſh regiment, was ſummoned on the firſt of February, and general Lemaire ſent with the ſummons a copy of the proclamation iſſued by the ſtates-general of Holland, requiring all garriſon towns, in conſequence of the ſtadtholder's abdication, to open their gates to the French. The governor immediately capitulated. He wiſhed to inſert an article for permitting the Engliſh regiment to paſs to England, but this was poſitively refuſed.

The whole province of Zealand capitulated to general Michaud on the fourth of February. Perfect religious liberty was guaranteed, property ſecured; French troops were not to be put into the garriſons, nor were aſſignats to be forcibly circulated. Overyſſel, Groningen, were in ſome meaſure occupied ſtill by the Engliſh, being on the right ſide of Yſſel, where they had formed a line from Doesburg to Campen. This poſition was allowedly ſtrong and tenable, but to a beaten army no defences are ſecure. Thoſe who had not heſitated to croſs the Lys, Scheldt, Meuſe, Waal, and Leck, and defeated the enemy under all theſe obſtacles, would not be intimidated by the Yſſel. The Engliſh appear to be aware of this fact, and as ſoon as the French advanced guard appeared at Herdenwich, they were ſtruck with ſuch a panic that they abandoned Campen and Zwol. This puſilanimity encouraged the victors to purſue their ſucceſs and to complete the entire conqueſt of Holland before they ſhould repoſe. M'Donald took a poſition between Campen, Zwol, and Deventher. After the French had thus croſſed the Yſſel, the Engliſe totally abandoned the Dutch territory and retired into Weſtphalia, and the king of Pruſſia having formed a line of troops from Embden to Weſel, the Engliſh took a poſition which placed the Pruſſians between them and the republicans!

While theſe events were progreſſing, the commiſſioners of the convention were providing means of comfort and repoſe for their toil-worn victors. A requiſition was made for a ſupply of clothing and proviſions for the republican citizens in arms. The French republic was pledged for the payment of the amount, and a proclamation iſſued by the ſtates general on the twenty-ſeventh of January ſtates, that the demand was made not as a conqueror but as an ally, in ſupport of the common cauſe.

The peace and unanimity with which the revolution of Holland was effected reflects high credit on the French armies, and exhibits an important leſſon to corrupt governors, of the little dependence which they can place on a people whoſe rights they deſtroy and whoſe happineſs they ſacrifice to foreign influence or perſonal ambition. The French entered one of the firſt capital cities of Europe, and one of the richeſt, without parade, pomp or diſorder; not in large bodies but in ſmall diviſions. It was three days before they aſſembled in a body, and the whole road from the Waal to Amſterdam was covered with officers and privates, without diſcrimination, travelling along with ſongs and feſtivity that reſembled rather the proceſſion of peace to a rural fair, than the march of warriors in a conquered country. As the French approached the towns in all their marches, the magiſtrates deputed perſons to wait on them; the municipalities were reorganized, the the opulent in common with the poor, now entered the ranks as guards of police, order was every where preſerved, and the extraordinary ſight was beheld of a people who had been dull, ſullen, and patient under a government, hailing the approach of their conquerors and rejoicing in the conqueſt. This ſpectacle was a remarkable contraſt to that which had preceded it. The diſorder and rapine of the Engliſh ſoldiery was ſuch while in Holland, that the duke of York not only hanged ſeveral of his unfortunate ſoldiers, but was induced from the frequency of their diſorderly behaviour, to delegate an authority to his provoſt-marſhal to diſpenſe with every form of trial, and an the detection of any diſorder or robbery, to hang the perſons up. Such was the difference between the conduct of the enemies and the friends of the Dutch.

On the twenty-ſeventh of January the proviſional repreſentatives of the people of the ſtate of Holland aſſembled, and unanimouſly elected citizen Pierre Paulus their preſident, and in a ſpeech adapted with great addreſs to the character of the people and the occaſion; he dilated on the happy releaſe which they obtained from the corrupt tyranny of the ſtadtholder, and the glorious proſpect they now had of re-eſtabliſhing that freedom, for which their anceſtors ſuffered ſo much— he conſidered the extraordinary froſt of the ſeaſon, by which their delivery had been facilitated as an interference of providence in their behalf— and recommended a ſuitable ſpirit of juſtice, equity, and humanity in all their proceedings— that all hatreds ſhould be laid aſide, and even former wrongs forgotten.—

Several decrees were paſſed for the future regulation of the government, and the depoſition of the ſtadtholder from all his offices. Among theſe were, a declaration of the ſovereignty of the Dutch people, and of the rights of man— the abolition of the offices of ſtadtholder, admiral and captain general of the United Provinces, and all their appendages— the college of the deputy council and chamber of accounts were ſuppreſſed, and a committee of public ſafety, of military affairs, and of finance eſtabliſhed in their room— the commiſſion of deputies to the aſſembly, calling itſelf the ſtates general, was recalled— the right of ſhooting, hunting, and fiſhing on a man's own ground was reſtored— taxes proviſionally continued, but to be ſpeedily equalized— inundations to be repaired— the ſuſpenſion of the powers of the agents of the ſtates general at Paris— the commiſſion of the new repreſentatives to take place of the ſtates general now aboliſhed.

The aſſembly next directed its attention to the ſtate of the bank of Amſterdam; nothing ſo much proves the moderation of the French, and the diſpoſition of the Dutch to the overthrow of their former government, as the ſtate of this inſtitution. It appeared that no deficiency whatever exiſted in the affairs of the bank; but that the debts balanced the credits, with an exception of ſecurities which had been from time to time received in lieu of money, during the laſt fifty years; ſuch as bonds of the the India company of Amſterdam, guaranteed by different ſtates; of bonds of the ſtates and the city of Amſterdam; and of loans iſſued on ſuch ſecurities; but that the intereſt on all demands againſt the bank, continued to be fully and punctually paid.

The retreat of the Britiſh army by the route of Deventher has been noticed. They reached that place on the twenty-ſixth and twenty-ſeventh of January, but were not long able to maintain themſelves in that poſition, as they were cloſely purſued by about forty thouſand of the French. At Deventher, Zwol, Zutphen, they left great numbers of ſick behind. Of the loſs in this march no return has been ever given, but it has been computed that the Engliſh could not have loſt leſs than ſix thouſand men out of thirteen thouſand that remained alive on the firſt of February. On the march from Amersfort alone, three hundred ſoldiers were frozen to death, beſide women and children, the number of waggons employed for the removal of the ſick was one hundred and ſixty, which at the rate of ten only to a waggon made ſixteen hundred, independent of the wounded and deſparate caſes left behind. A greater ſcene of human miſery perhaps never was exhibited than in the marches of the Engliſh in this winter campaign. And the general corruption of the government pevaded even the departments of miſery. The wine provided for the ſick was waſted in debauchery by the commiſſaries, or ſold to provide for their extravagance, while the hoſpitals were left in want; and even the perſons ſent as ſurgeons to the armies were ſo totally ignorant of their profeſſion, that hundreds fell victims to this branch of patronage. In the two days that the Engliſh remained at Zutphen they deſtroyed 12,000 ſtand of arms, 50,000 pounds of powder, ſome millions of muſquet ammunition, one hundred gun carriages, ſpiked all their artillery, and deſtroyed all their working implements and ſtores to an incredible amount. This was the people deſtined to conquer France! O miſerable and horrible blindneſs and depravity! O ſad and lamentable evidence of national blindneſs and ambitious imbecility!

On the tenth of February the republican flying army was obliged to abate their progreſs at Scuttorp, from a prodigious flood of the river Vecht, which was occaſioned by a ſudden thaw; and the ſoldiers were employed in breaking the maſſes of ice which clogged the arches of the bridge in order to clear a paſſage for the waters. On the twelfth they croſſed the Ems at Rheine, and proceeded on their march without interruption till the twenty-fourth, when the poſts of Nieuhaus and Velthuys, chiefly occupied by the emigrant corps, were attacked by an advanced guard of the republicans, and driven before them with one hundred killed and wounded.

The Engliſh diviſion under lord Cathcart encountered ſtill greater difficulties, as his rear was continually harraſſed by the French advanced parties. At Gomingen the Engliſh were refuſed admittance into the city, and every where they were treated with diſreſpect and diſlike. On the twenty-ſeventh and twenty-eighth of March the main body of the Engliſh reached Bremen, where they remained until the tenth of April, when they cloſed their career of madneſs, and miſery by embarking for England.

Here ended the victories of the French in the nothern countries: and having nothing on that ſide but the ſea and the ſtates of the king of Pruſſia, with whoſe troops they received orders to forbear from all hoſtilities on the firſt of March; they were of neceſſity forced to terminate their conqueſts, not for want of warriors but of countries to conquer.

The two diviſions of the army of the Sambre and Meuſe, being no longer neceſſary here, they repaſſed the Rhine and again joined Jourdan, following his movements up that river, where he took poſt near Coblentz, relieving the army of the Moſelle that was near Luxembourg; this latter joined the army of the Rhine before Mentz. After the conqueſt of Holland was thus completed all the armies were ready to act with thoſe in other quarters, excepting twenty-five thouſand men, which the Batavian republic obtained from the French government.

Several changes now took place in the armies. Pichegru, whoſe command of the armies in Holland amounted to little more than an agency, for tranſmitting the orders of the military committee and for making returns of the operations of the ſeveral diviſions; was now removed to the command of the army of the Rhine and Moſelle, he retained the nominal command of the Sambre and Meuſe army led by Jourdan; Moreau was appointed to the command of the army of the north.

Poſterity will with difficulty credit the aſtoniſhing exploits of the French during this winter campaign; and hiſtory, though it ſhall confine itſelf to the bounds of the moſt ſcrupulous fidelity, finding nothing in the lapſe of ages to compare with the French victories, they will appear doubtful. They will behold formidable enemies ſurrounding France in every point—the two Sicilies, Tuſcany, Portugal, Spain, Sardinia, on the ſouth; Auſtria and the vaſt horde of feudal powers on the eaſt; England, Holland, Pruſſia, Ruſſia, on the north, pouring force and corruption on the French territory, and even blocking up the univerſal high-road of the ocean; while a horrible ſcene of carnage is fomented in la Vendee on the weſt. The whole force of Europe concentrated againſt one people, againſt a people deemed frivolous, effeminate, and inconſtant; deprived by fear or treachery of external ſuccour, torn to pieces by internal faction and civil war; againſt a ſtate whoſe bands of ſociety were torn aſunder; without fixed leaders, without money, without bread; abandoned to anarchy, a prey to the moſt fatal conſpiracies, and the moſt virtuous and zealous ſupporters of her glory, her freedom, and her ſafety aſſaſſinated on the pretence of promoting her ſecurity. Who will believe that a ſtate thus aſſailed, apparently tottering on the verge of ruin, could abide ſuch terrible ſhocks, could ſupport ſuch an immenſe burthen, and parry blows multiplied, ſudden, and dextrous? Who could believe that France thus aſſailed ſhould ſtill maintain her territories untouched? Yet all this ſhe has done, and actions more prodigious. Not contented with defending her ancient boundaries, ſhe has enlarged them, and diſmembered thoſe powers who had contracted to diſmember and parcel her out; and at the moment when all Europe believed that her ſubjugation was on the verge of being accompliſhed and her conſequence as a nation annihilated for ever.

In the days of Scipio, the exploits of Hannibal brought Rome to the verge of deſtruction. The dangers that threatened the city rouſed the dormant courage of the Romans. They conquered Hannibal; and not contented with eſcaping the greateſt of dangers, they carried war, ravage, and deſtruction into the boſom of Carthage. This is the only hiſtorical fact which bears any reſemblance to the matchleſs events of the campaign. But what a diſparity! The Romans had but one power to combat; the French had at leaſt thirty. The former needed only to direct their ſtrength to one point; the latter had to reſiſt on every point of a vaſt circumference. The Romans were united at home, the French were torn by diſcord. The former had a wiſe and well organized government, the latter were without one, and preyed upon by an unexampled tyranny, ſupported on the credulity of the people and the ſucceſſes of the armies. The Romans terminated their triumph by the deſtruction of their rival, the French conquered Holland and gave it freedom; they conquered Belgium and gave her the privileges of her own vaſt fortunes and name in place of ſubjection and ſlavery.

Could it be ſuppoſed that a people, ſurrounded by hoſts of diſciplined men and led by generals bred up to tactics, and inured to all the arts of war; ſhould with armies of youths taken from the plough be able to drive them from their territories, conquer empires, paſs the Alps and Pyrenees, traverſe the moraſſes of Batavia, and extend their conqueſts beyond all former martial power, and under circumſtances of difficulty equally unexampled? Yet all this was done, and ſucceeding years were even to elevate the heroic character of theſe republicans ſtill higher on the liſts of glory and ſpread wider her conqueſts and freedom.

While theſe unparalleled events were taking place in the Low Countries, the military operations on the Rhine, and in other parts appeared to languiſh, and few movements of much importance were attempted by the French. But they were not wholly inactive, for in the month of December they appear to have entertained hopes of the ſpeedy reduction of Mentz, and began to tranſport towards its vicinity, a quantity of heavy artillery from Landau and other parts. On the twenty-fourth of that month the fort Du Rhine which covered Manheim, ſurrendered to the arms of the republic by capitulation, without a gun being fired; thus this beautiful town was ſaved from the calamities of a bombardment. On the twenty-ninth, the fort of Zulback near Mentz ſuſtained three attacks from the French; but they were repulſed with the loſs of four hundred men. The balls reached Mentz and killed a young woman ſtanding in the market place. After the reduction of Manheim, the troops which had been employed againſt the fort of the Rhine were ſent to reinforce the army before Mentz. The operations of the ſiege, however, were ſuſpended and converted into a blockade until the ſummer.

A. D. 1795.] In March the republicans were enabled to make ſome advances into the biſhopric of Munſter. Bentheim was taken early in that month, after an obſtinate engagement, and on the thirty-firſt they advanced to Bienen, a league diſtant from Rees, and an engagement commenced at an early hour. The French were at firſt repulſed, but having brought according to their new tactics, freſh bodies of troops into action, the battle terminated in the total defeat of the Auſtrians, and a great ſlaughter of their troops. Bienen was immediately taken. After this the Auſtrians appear to have loſt all energy and activity in the north of Germany, and the conqueſts of the French were only bounded by natural obſtacles or neutral territory.

On the ſide of Spain victory ſeemed equally to precede the armies of the republic; and the only reſiſtance which they experienced was from bad roads and the natural ramparts of the country, its mountains, through which the French generals with the ardor and perſeverance of Hannibal, were forced to cut their way. The port of Roſes, eight leagues to the north-eaſt of Gironne, in the province of Catalonia, and on the borders of the Mediterranean ſea, was conſidered as an object of great importance, the whole force of the army of the Eaſtern Pyrenees was directed towards its reduction at the cloſe of the year 1794. The poſſeſſion of the fort of Bouten, which commanded the bay of Roſes, and kept the naval forces in check, was firſt neceſſary to be taken, and it was carried with the accuſtomed intripidity and gallantry of the republicans; after which, the ſiege of Roſes commenced in form, and the firſt parallel was opened before its gates; but the operations were interrupted by an unuſual flood from the fall of a heavy rain and melting of ſnow, and twenty-three days elapſed before the beſiegers could employ their works; and a new mode of attack was determined upon. A ſmall hill which overhung the city, was occupied by the French engineers, and on the night of the thirtieth of December a battery of eighteen 24-pounders was began and completed. On the morning of the third of January, they began to batter in breach, but the firſt ſhot was ſcarcely fired when the French volunteers ſolicited permiſſion to mount to the aſſault. The wall was already damaged, but the garriſon embraced the darkneſs of the night to embark on board the ſhips anchored in the bay; leaving five hundred and forty men who ſurrendered at diſcretion. The inhabitants were under extreme apprehenſions, but they were ſoon relieved by the good order and liberality of the generals and the republican ſoldiery. On the fifteenth of May another ſignal victory was obtained over the Spaniards; about 3000 men appeared on the ſide of Siſtellia, and endeavoured to ſurround the French. They were attacked and put to flight with great loſs. Shortly after the negociations, for which the firſt overtures came from Spain through the American miniſter, terminated in a treaty, which delivered the Spaniards from an abſurd, a prodigal, and a diſgraceful war. The particulars ſhall be noticed in another place.

In addition to the obſervations above offered on the unrivalled ſucceſſes of the republican armies, it may be intereſting to give a liſt of the acquiſitions made by the republic from the commencement of the war, to this period, as it was preſented to the convention in a report, and the facts are all particularly and ſpecially corroborated by the exiſting ſtate of things at the time:—

The nine United Provinces of Brabant, Antwerp, Mechlin, Limburg, Luxemburg, Namur, Hainault, Artois, Cambreſis, and Flanders; forming the Auſtrian Netherlands, before ſubject to the emperor of Germany.

The Seven United Provinces of Holland, Zealand, Frieſland, Groningen, Overyſſel, Guelderland, and Utrecht, forming the Dutch nation, ſubject formerly to the ſtadtholder.

The principality of Liege, with the cities of Liege and Spa, formerly ſubject to the prince biſhop of Liege.

The biſhopric of Spires with its chief city, formerly ſubject to its ſovereign biſhop.
The biſhopric of Worms, ſubject to its biſhop.
The duchy of Deux Ponts, formerly ſubject to the elector palatine.
All the electorate of Treves on the ſouth ſide of the Rhine, with the chief city of the electorate, and the city of Coblentz.
All the electorate of Cologne on the ſouth ſide of the Rhine with its chief city.
All the electorate of Mentz, its chief city only excepted, on the ſouth ſide of the Rhine.
All the dominions of the elector Palatine, on the ſouth ſide of the Rhine, with Manheim the chief city.
The duchy of Juliers, with its chief city, Aix la Chapelle, formerly ſubject to the elector Palatine.
The duchy of Cleves, with the cities of Cleves and Weſel, formerly ſubject to the king of Pruſſia.
In the ſouth the duchy of Savoy, with its chief city Chamberry, formerly ſubject to the king of Sardinia.
The city and county of Nice, with its capital port, formerly ſubject to Sardinia.
The principality of Monaco formerly ſubject to its peculiar prince.
From Spain the greateſt part of their richeſt provinces of Biſcay and Catalonia, with their important cities, garriſons, forts, and founderies.
To all which was to be added the Dutch naval force, and all the immenſe reſources and ſtores of that general depot of Europe.
The whole of theſe countries are calculated to contain a population of thirteen milions!
With this account a table of military events was preſented to the convention by Carnot; it commences with the battle of Hondſchoote, and ends with the capture of Roſes, embracing a period of only ſeventeen months—

Victories including eight pitched battles,	27	Forts and redoubts,	230
Actions of leſs note,	120	Cannon taken,	3,800
Killed of the enemy,	84,000	Muſkets,	70,000
Priſoners,	91,000	Powder, pounds,	1,900,000
Strong places and cities taken,	116	Pair of colours,	60
By ſiege or blockade,	36

This table was ordered to be hung up in the hall of the convention, and ſent to the armies.
It is almoſt impoſſible to form an eſtimate of the immenſe advantages which the French derived from theſe conqueſts. The ſtores and granaries of Oſtend alone afforded a ſupply to the republic equal to ten millions; and Belgium afforded a contribution of twenty-five millions in ſpecie. For eight months the armies of the republic ſubſiſted wholly on the produce of the captured countries. The domains liable to be taken into the hands of the republic were eſtimated at three thouſand millions of livres; and this only was more than ſufficient to ſecure the principal of all the aſſignats in circulation.
The commiſſioners ſent into the conquered countries conducted themſelves in a manner that attached the conquered to the republic; their meaſures were regulated by the moſt moderate principles; and not content with ſecuring the people in quiet poſſeſſion of their property, they undertook to provide for the ſupport of the poor at the national expence; induſtry was encouraged, and every incitement held out to promote confidence and attachment. Even the contributions were levied in ſuch a manner as to relieve the collection from the uſual antipathy excited by taxation; the proportions were regulated by property.

While France triumphed againſt her external enemies and the tyranny that had ſo long diſtracted the boſom of her government; civil war was once more rekindled in the infatuated country of La Vendée. This tract of territory has been before deſcribed; its inhabitants ſimple, ignorant, and eaſily deluded by their clergy, were at once the ſport of bigotry and foreign corruption. The emiſſaries of treachery from England, and of ſuperſtition from Rome, acted in a common concert with the adherents of royalty. The efforts of theſe apoſtles of deſolation were not ſo ſucceſsful where there was a free circulation of the popular Journals, or where the national-guards were regularly organiſed. It has been alſo aſſerted with much appearance of probability that Robeſpierre by his meaſures and emiſſaries rather cheriſhed and encouraged this civil war than otherwiſe. According to a report delivered by Carnot to the convention, the moſt treacherous artifices had been employed by the uſurper to delude the inſurgents into confidence, to flatter their hopes at one time and drive them to deſpair at another; to afford them hopes of aid, and then to betray them; ſo that they paid no regard to the declarations or promiſes made in the name of the government; and at length they broke out into a revolt cauſed at once by foreign corruption and local deſpair.

In treating of the events in this quarter in the preceding part of this volume, it was noticed, that although driven acroſs the Loire after they had been defeated at Martagne and Cholle, the natural receſſes of that romantic country ſtill afforded ſhelter to thouſands, and if they were no longer able to make a deciſive ſtand in the face of day, ſtill their nocturnal devaſtations harraſſed the peaceable citizens, and almoſt rendered the country a deſart. Among a people ſo much attached to royalty and ariſtocracy, and inured to the feudal ſyſtem, it might have been expected that their leaders would have been perſons ſelected for their long uncontaminated courſe of noble anceſtry, carrying the miſty dignity of titular rank, or at leaſt diſtinguiſhable by talents or education. But the moſt conſpicuous chieftains of the apoſtolic and royal army were Charette, who had been a lieutenant of marines, and Stofflet, who had been a game-keeper. The latter plebeian leader, however appears to have poſſeſſed talents, that could not be expected from a perſon whoſe education was defective, and was much ſuperior to his companion in command. Charette ſeems to have been diſtinguiſhable only for invincible courage and great ferocity. Stofflet even in regular warfare would have been deemed a good partiſan by ſuch heroes as Frederic the great man-killer of Pruſſia. Both poſſeſſed a complete knowledge of the country.

The downfall of Robeſpierre was followed by this ſingular effect; the ſuppreſſion of the Vendéan inſurgents. An amneſty was publiſhed upon the propoſition of Carnot to the convention, and proclaimed throughout Vendée, offering, inſtead of fire, ſword, and proſcription, which had deſolated their country, pardon, amity, and protection; this with the puniſhment of Carrier appear to have had the happieſt effect. The chiefs were deſerted by their followers, and the commiſſioners received the penitents who flocked into them with cordiality and generoſity.

After ſome preliminary negociations in the beginning of February, Charette and the principal chiefs of his army, in the name of the Vendéans, and another chief of the name of Cormartin, repreſenting thoſe inſurgents known by the name of Chouans, or night-owls, ſignified their intention to live in future ſubject to the laws of the republic, and to deliver up all their arms and magazines. Stofflet alone at the head of a few hundreds, reſiſted for ſome time the offers of amneſty, either through jealouſy of the other chiefs who ſubmitted, or in the expectation of obtaining better terms. In the mean time conferences were opened in February at Laple, about three leagues from Nantz, between all the chiefs of the Chouans and Vandeans, with the repreſentatives of the people on miſſion in that department; and on the third of March the treaty was ſolemnly concluded, ſigned, and ratified at Nantz.

The entry of Charette and his companions into that city was announced by a diſcharge of artillery; Charette who rode a beautiful charger, was dreſſed in blue, and had a tri-color ribbon thrown round him as a ſaſh, his hat decorated with a long feather; he was followed at the head of the proceſſion by four of his lieutenants; then followed a groupe of repreſentatives; then another groupe formed of the ſtaff of Charette; another of repreſentatives; then Canclaux general of the army of the Weſt with his ſtaff and the Vendean officers; a company of infantry, a ſquadron of dragoons, one of gendarmes, and a detachment of the grenadiers of the national-guard, preceded by a numerous band of muſicians, and followed by the remnant of the Nantes cavalry; and laſtly two coaches decorated with the cap of liberty, and filled with the pacificatory commiſſaries. The repreſentatives ſeemed to be animated with joy, and frequently exclaimed vive la paix, which was repeated by the people. Charette did not appear cheerful.

The proceſſion marched into the town very ſlowly; thence they repaired to the quarters of the repreſentatives, where the chiefs partook of ſome refreſhments. Many of them went to the play-houſe. At their appearance the orcheſtra played the favourite tune, Où peut-en être mieux qu'an ſein de ſa famille? The ſpectators accompanied with enthuſiaſm. The municipal officers cauſed the air to be repeated ſeveral times. The acclamations, the bravos, the clappings of hands, rendered that ſcene truly affecting. Thoſe, however, who were the objects of it, appeared but little to participate in the rejoicing.

The declaration ſigned by Charette, Cormartin, Sapineau, and the other chiefs, was expreſſed in very ſtrong terms; ſuch as were calculated entirely to perſuade the country of their ſincerity, and ſuch as left no room for evaſion, with reſpect to the nature and objects of the treaty.

"Whilſt an oppreſſive government (ſay they) deprived our fellow-citizens of their moſt precious rights, we have defended ours with firmneſs and perſeverance. We exhauſted in our misfortunes every ſucceſſive aid. Deſpair at length lent us its frightful ſuccour, and rendering us inſenſible to thoſe conſiderations which ſoften the moſt ferocious hearts, had engraved on ours rather the reſolution to die, than to live under ſuch a tyranny.

"But now the government of blood has diſappeared. The leaders of that impious faction which covered France with cypreſs and mourning, have paid, with their heads, the forfeit of their criminal deſigns. The repreſentative Ruelle, the friend of the laws and of humanity, is come to bear amongſt us the words of peace. That confidence which had been weakened by the acts of barbarity which had preceded his miſſion, begins now to revive. On his appearance, we feel no diſinclination to ſuch approaches as may tend to remove the calamitous effects of our diviſions. New repreſentatives worthy of our eſteem and our praiſe, have been joined to the firſt; we have informed them of our intentions, and our deſire of a ſincere pacification, guaranteed by honour. In our conferences we have made them underſtand what intereſted the happineſs of our country, and what it belonged to their prudence and wiſdom to grant, for the purpoſe of obtaining the deſireable end of peace. United in the ſame tent with the repreſentatives of the people, we felt more ſtrongly, if poſſible, that we were ſtill Frenchmen, and ſhould be animated only by the general good of the country.

"It is with theſe ſentiments that we declare to the national convention, and to France, our ſubmiſſion to the French republic, one and indiviſible, and our acknowlegement of its laws; and that we enter into a formal engagement not to make any attempt againſt them. We promiſe to ſurrender, as ſoon as poſſible, all the artillery and horſes in our poſſeſſion; and we make a ſolemn promiſe never to bear arms againſt the republic."

At the ſame time an addreſs was publiſhed by Charette, and four others of the principal revolters, to the inhabitants of La Vendee, exhorting them to ſubmit to the laws, —extolling the juſtice and liberality of the convention,—and ſetting before them, in a ſtrong point of view, the folly and miſchief of perſeverance in a bad cauſe.

The reſiſtance of Stofflet was protracted, as has already been intimated, for a few weeks; but the deſertion of all the other royaliſts, and even their determination to take an active part, and to aſſiſt the republicans in reducing to ſubmiſſion this refractory general, appears to have had a ſenſible effect upon his army, which was conſiderably weakened by gradual deſertions. On the twentieth of April, Stofflet, and the remainder of the Chouan generals, ſigned a public declaration of their ſubmiſſion to the laws of the republic. It was in the following terms:

"We, the underſigned commander in chief and officers of the catholic and royal army of Anjou and Upper Poitou, do hereby declare, that, animated by a deſire of peace, we have delayed its concluſion to this day, for no other reaſon, than that we might previouſly take the ſenſe of the people, with whoſe intereſts we are entruſted, and of the chiefs of the catholic and royal army of Brittany. Now, that their ſentiments have been proclaimed, not only by a publication of the twelfth of February 1795, entitled Words of Peace, but alſo by the declaration of the firſt of Floreal (April 19,) we accede to the meaſures taken by the repreſentatives of the people, to pacify the departments hitherto in a ſtate of inſurrection, by ſubmitting to the laws of the republic, one and indiviſible, and promiſing never to carry arms againſt her, and to deliver up our artillery as ſoon as poſſible.

"May this declaration on our part contribute entirely to extinguiſh the flames of civil diſcord, and convince foreign nations, that France no longer contains but one family; and that we earneſtly wiſh that they may ſoon form one ſociety of friends.

"We alſo requeſt the repreſentatives of the people, who have concluded this pacification, to repair to the national convention, there to atteſt the ſincerity of our ſentiments, and to deſtroy the ſuſpicions which diſaffected perſons may excite againſt the loyalty of our intention."

The ſingular circumſtances of the caſe render it neceſſary to inſert theſe authorities at full length, as they form the only proper criterion for determining concerning the guilt or innocence, the integrity or falſehood, of the individuals who afterwards acted in direct violation of them,— and as they may poſſibly aſſiſt us in accounting for the ſubſequent conduct of the parties concerned.

Early in March a naval action took place between the French and the Engliſh ſquadrons in the Mediterranean. The Engliſh fleet had ſo much retarded the tranſport of grain to France that the committee of public ſafety directed the ſquadron at Toulon to put to ſea and fight the enemy wherever found. Rear admiral Martin in the Sans-culotte of 120 guns, having the national commiſſioner Letourneur (afterwards a member of the directory) on board, ſailed from Toulon, with fourteen other ſhips of the line, three frigates and three ſmaller veſſels, the latter end of February. On the 6th of March off cape Corſe they deſcried a ſhip of war coming out of the gulph of St. Fiorenzo, which proved to be the Berwick of ſeventy-four guns on her way to join the Engliſh fleet then at anchor in the bay of Leghorn. Three frigates were ſent to attack this ſhip to whom ſhe ſtruck after a ſhort action. On the 11th of March, the Mercure of ſeventy-four guns ſeparated from the French fleet in a gale, together with the Berwick. The French admiral ſhifted his flag on board the frigate la Friponne, and with him went the commiſſioner, in order to direct the movements of the fleet with more alacrity. On the 12th the Sans-culotte parted company, and on the ſame day the Engliſh fleet appeared in ſight, having ſailed from Leghorn on the 8th, upon hearing that the French fleet was at ſea. The Engliſh fleet conſiſted of fourteen ſail of the line and three frigates. Both fleets were on the ſame tack, ſtanding towards cape Noli; on the morning of the 13th the Engliſh admiral threw out a ſignal for the line of battle, which was alſo done by the French admiral on board his frigate; the Ca-ira of 80 guns, an unwildly ſhip, in tacking fell on board the Victorie, carried away her two top-maſts, and threw the rear of the French into diſorder, which the Engliſh admiral improved, and ordered a frigate to rake her fore and aft, which ſhe did ſeverely till the Agamemnon Engliſh ſhip came up and poured in ſeveral broadſides, which totally diſabled the Victoire.

Meanwhile the Ca-ira was expoſed to the fire of the whole Engliſh van for two hours, by which ſhe was ſo much diſabled as to render it neceſſary for a frigate to tow her off, which was done by La Veſtal with great ſkill. The Cenſeur which was at the head of the line received orders to cover the Veſtal, but inſtead thereof the Cenſeur took her in tow, notwithſtanding repeated orders, which however appear to have been the effect of miſtake.

On the morning of the fourteenth the two diſabled ſhips of the French fleet were conſiderably diſtant, and cloſe to the Engliſh van, and the latter appeared working up to cut them off. The French fleet was under the land and becalmed, the Engliſh farther out had a light land breeze; and in this ſituation the two diſabled ſhips were attacked again; while the fleet made every effort to come down to their aſſiſtance, but got very ſlowly into action. The Courageax and Illuſtrious Engliſh ſhips were ſeverely received by the Caira and Cenſeur; but an Engliſh three-decker raked them ſo ſeverely that they could no longer move. Three others of the French fleet only got into action, but the conflict was ſevere and laſted till two o'clock in the afternoon. Two of the Engliſh ſhips were diſmaſted. The conflict ended in the retreat of the French ſhips that had been in action, leaving the Ca-ira and Cenſeur in poſſeſſion of the Engliſh. The loſs of men in the Engliſh fleet was ſeventy-five killed and two hundred and eighty wounded. The Engliſh ſhip Illuſtrious was afterwards caſt away near Avenza, having been rendered wholly unmanageable. This action was a very ſtriking proof of the want of diſcipline in the naval operations of the French, and ſhewed alſo what they were capable of executing with that acquiſition. It is remarkable that among the fifteen ſhips of this French fleet, ſix were ſhips which admiral Hood had reported burnt by him on his flight from Toulon in 1793, viz. Le Tonnant, Le Conquerant, Le Mercure, Le Heureux, Le Timoleon (then called La Commerce de Bourdeaux) and La Ca-ira (then called La Couronne) and a ſeventh, the Alcide, reported by admiral Hood to be unfit for ſervice, was one of the ſame fleet.

In the beginning of June another naval affair occurred, in which the ſkill of the Engliſh navy was very conſpicuouſly diſplayed in a retreat, Admiral Cornwallis with five ſhips of the line and two frigates was cruiſing off Belleiſle on the 16th of June, fell in with a French fleet of thirteen ſail of the line and ſome frigates; a calm coming on nothing occurred, but in the morning the French fleet was ſeen bearing upon both quarters of the Engliſh to windward. About nine o'clock, the leading ſhips of the French line began to fire upupon the Engliſh ſhip Mars, which as well as the reſt of the Engliſh fleet kept up a running fire during the whole day; the Engliſh admiral is ſaid to have eſcaped by throwing out a ſignal for a large fleet being in ſight, which induced the French fleet to ſlacken ſail in order to form a compact line, by which means the Engliſh admiral had an opportunity to eſcape.

On the 23d of the ſame month a naval victory of ſome importance was achieved by admiral Bridport, over the French fleet that had chaſed Cornwallis, off L'Orient. The Engliſh force conſiſted of fourteen ſhips of the line and eight frigates; the French of twelve ſhips of the line and nine frigates. At dawn of day on the twenty-ſecond the fleets came in ſight. The French appeared to bear up in line of battle, they continued to manoeuvre, there being little wind all the night; on the morning the action commenced about ſix o'clock and continued until three o'clock in the afternoon. It terminated in the capture of the Formidable, the Tigre, and the Alexander, the latter an Engliſh ſhip that been captured in the laſt year. In the courſe of the winter of 1794, a French ſquadron of one ſhip of the line, two frigates, and two ſloops deſtroyed all the Engliſh ſettlements on the coaſt of Africa, took a number of merchant ſhips and an immenſe quantity of plunder.

The difficulty of proceeding in the narration of the winter campaign, and paying at the ſame time a regard to the annual courſe of the political tranſactions of France, has rendered it neceſſary, in order to connect the meaſures which had a relation to each other, to blend them with the tranſactions of this year.

The convention which had been ſo much diſtinguiſhed in the extraordinary events of the revolution, which from 1792 to 1795 had, exhibited ſo much ſplendor and littleneſs, ſo much of glory and crimes, ſo much of the dignity of liberty and the degradation of faction and tyranny, was to cloſe its labours in this year; and by its concluding acts removed the odium which it had ſuffered to be inflicted on France, and in ſome degree compenſated for the injuries which it had endured in the ſacrifice of the virtuous and the abuſe of the cauſe of liberty.

The puniſhment of Carriere, was a ſtrong evidence of the return of pure and humane principles; and it was eaſy to ſee that it was only a prelude to bolder meaſures and the reſtoration of the laws of equity and juſtice. Le Bon the inſtrument of Robeſpierre, had been put under arreſt on the ninth of Thermidor, but his trial had from various cauſes been delayed; Fouquier Tainville the ſanguinary public accuſer had alſo been placed in arreſt. The preſidents of the revolutionary-tribunal had been puniſhed, but Tainville was not tried until December 1794, a decree was paſſed againſt both of theſe, and a report ordered to be made by the committees on their crimes. On the ſame day Tallien moved that a report ſhould be made concerning all thoſe perſons impriſoned on the ninth and tenth of Thermidor, in order that thoſe who were innocent or miſled ſhould be releaſed, and the ſeverity of juſtice exerciſed on the principals only. A decree was alſo paſſed charging the committees to reviſe the whole code of laws, and to propoſe the repeal of ſuch as ſhould be found contrary to juſtice and liberality. On the ſeventeenth of December it was decreed that both the judges and jury of the revolutionary-tribunal ſhould be replaced.

The decree of the maximum, or higheſt fixed price of the neceſſaries of life, had now been found to contribute to rather than diminiſh the diſtreſſes which it was meant to prevent, and it was repealed on the twenty-third of December. About the ſame time a moſt elaborate report from the united committees of commerce and finances was preſented by Johannot, from which it appeared that the national domains which remained unſold in 1794 were on a moderate calculation worth upwards of 600,000,000 pounds ſterling! and the paper money which had been iſſued on their ſecurity amounted to little more than one third of that value. It alſo appeared that the eſtates which had been confiſcated, of nobles and others, and valued by public appraiſers, had, on an average of the whole of thoſe that had been ſold, produced two-fifths more than the ſums at which they had been valued!

About the cloſe of the ſame month the debates in the convention became ſo diſorderly, that it was neceſſary to paſs a decree, ordering that if any member ſhould inſult his colleague, he ſhould be committed to the Abbey priſon. Some other meaſures of internal police were adopted in the beginning of the year; and, on the twenty-firſt of February, a decree highly honourable to the convention was paſſed, for ſecuring the freedom of religious worſhip and opinions.

The firſt diplomatic tranſaction of the year 1795, preſented to the cognizance of the convention was fatally omenous to the combined powers, and auſpicious to the republic. On the tenth of February Richard announced to the repreſentatives of the French people, that a treaty of peace and amity had been concluded by the committee of public ſafety, with the grand duke of Tuſcany, who had formally detached himſelf from the grand alliance. The treaty was taken into conſideration on the thirteenth, when ſome doubts were entertained of the power of the committee to conclude a treaty; but the period of factious diſtraction was paſſed, and it was wiſely determined that whatever tended to place an impediment in the way of peace, was contrary to good policy and the public proſperity; and the right and power of the committee to conclude treaties was ſupported by an almoſt unanimous vote. The treaty was in ſubſtance as follows:—

Article 1. The grand duke of Tuſcany having revoked all acts of adheſion, conſent and acceſſion to the armed coalition againſt the French republic. There will in conſe-

quence enſue peace, frendſhip, and good underſtanding between the two powers. 2. The neutrality of Tuſcany is re-eſtabliſhed, on the footing on which it ſtood before the eighth of October 1793. 3. The preſent treaty cannot take effect till it is ratified by the national convention.

In tracing the events that led to the fall of Robeſpierre, the exiſtence of two parties conſpiring to promote his overthrow without any confidential concert was noticed. The one conſiſting of the members of the committee, and the other of members of the convention; the former compoſed of Barrere, Billaud, Carnot, and others; the latter of Tallien, Legendre, Bourdon, and others. Theſe two parties, now began to teſtify a recibrocal jealouſy. The diſpoſitions of both parties evidently went to promote the proſperity and glory of the republic; they differed about the means; Barrere and his colleagues wiſhed to preſerve the revolutionary government in ſo much energy as would enſure the perpetuation of that vigor which had given glory to the republican arms; they wiſhed to deſtroy the internal terror and all faction, to bury paſt afflictions under an amneſty, and a general releaſe of all perſons not actually criminal, and to preſerve liberty and ſecurity to all friends of the republic. The other party were jealous of the revolutionary government; they did not indeed form a party in reality, ſince there was no one among them whoſe ſuperiority of credit or talents could attract them round him; among them were the enemies of Robeſpierre as well as the friends of Danton and of the Gironde party, they carried into their union againſt Robeſpierre all their generous partialities and all their fears; and many of them could not diveſt themſelves of that hatred which they had fixed upon the colleagues of Robeſpierre in common with himſelf. They wiſhed to do away the revolutionary government entirely, and conceived that the energy of the revolution might be preſerved under a regular and ſecure republican ſyſtem. The other party appeared to doubt the poſſibility of this; indeed it was the maxim of ages; but experience has proved their error, though their error was not a crime. This party alſo had perſonal conſiderations to influence them, they were conſcious of the odium which they ſhared with Robeſpierre by being joined with him in the committee; and however excuſable they may be in common with the convention at large in being the paſſive inſtruments or quieſcent ſpectators of his tyranny, they felt that their final co-operation in his overthrow would not exonerate them from the blame of his odious meaſures, nay, it appears ſtill clear that whether through motives of ſelf-ſecurity or fear, that ſome of the members were too conſpicuouſly active in the horrid proceedings of the tyrant, particularly in the ſacrifice of the Girondiſts, Danton, Camille, Madame Roland, and the Cuſtines; as well as in the horrid tranſactions at Lyons. Barrere, Billaud, and Collot were peculiarly liable to theſe imputations.

Under ſuch circumſtances the members of the old committee were not likely to ſtem the returning impulſe of offended liberality, notwithſtanding the acknowledged magnitude of their ſervices and indefatigability in the progreſs of the critical events of the revolution.

The reſtoration of the ſeventy-one members ejected for proteſting againſt the proſcription of the 31ſt of May, of Paine, of Lareveilliere Lepaux, of Lanjuinais, and ſome other remnants of the unfortunate Gironde party, was a ſevere blow to the members of the old committee, who had all participated in one or other ſhape in their misfortunes.

Yet that uſeful leſſon to all free people, and which ſhould never be forgotten that authority once eſtabliſhed may commit great crimes before it is ſubverted, and ſentiments however erroneous once imbibed are not eaſily eradicated, was very ſtrongly exemplified in this caſe. Though every voice joined in applauding the overthrow of Robeſpierre, yet ſeveral months after the death of the latter, the remains of the aſſaſſin Marat were transferred to the Pantheon. But public indignation was gradually awakened to this profanation by the popular journal of Freron and a popular air called "Le Reveïl du Peuple"; they were forcibly removed, and even the buſts and other monuments of Marat and his compeers were deſtroyed. In the courſe of the year a decree was paſſed that no perſon ſhould be honored with a place in the Pantheon until ten years after his death.

In Auguſt 1794 it has been noticed, that Lecointre of Verſailles had the courage to impugn the conduct of the members of the old committee, and to bring a detail of charges againſt ſome of them. That accuſation was treated rather with indifference, and determined to be groundleſs. In December the ſtate of things had given the accuſation a more ſerious aſpect, and Barrere, whoſe foreſight has been ſo remarkably conſpicuous, on this occaſion preſerved a cautious ſilence. The more irritable temper of Ballaud induced him to placard the walls of Paris with complaints of the villification of his character. On the 26th of December a motion was made, that the committees ſhould make a report the next day on the repreſentatives denounced by Lecointre; and a report was accordingly made "that there was no cauſe of enquiry into the conduct of Vouland, Amar, and David; but that there was room for enquiring into the conduct of Barrere, Billaud, Collot, and Vadier."

The public merits of ſome of the members had ſtill made a deep impreſſion on the public mind. The powerful activity and enthuſiaſm of Barrere could not be forgotten, and his ſpeech calling upon the people of France to riſe as one man, ſtill reſounded in the ears of Frenchmen, and had carried terror into the ſouls of their enemies. An attempt had been made to include the Lindets and Carnot in the accuſations, the former were exonerated by general aſſent; and in the inſtance of Carnot, a member roſe and exclaimed "What, accuſe him who organized our victories?"—The ſentiment caught the whole aſſembly, and they roſe ſpontaneouſly and declared Carnot inculpable. It was obſerved that for fifteen months Carnot ſpent eighteen hours every day in the duties of the military department, of which he had the direction!—That there were cruelties committed under the direction of the committee the members acknowleged, but the philoſopher ſtrongly contended for their exculpation by the frailties of human nature, and the perilous circumſtances in which they were placed; and the patriot painted in glowing colours the alarming ſituation of France, when the powers of Europe aſſembled their utmoſt force againſt them, to partition, to divide, to deſtroy, and to exterminate.

On the ſecond of March Saladin reported from the commiſſion of twenty-one, on the conduct of the accuſed deputies, in which they were ſaid to have exerciſed tyranny on the people and on the convention; that they had placed the nation in a ſtate of terror and conſtraint; had eſtabliſhed popular commiſſions on their private authority, and ſuffered the moſt atrocious mandates to be iſſued from the bureau of police by the direction of Robeſpierre or in his abſence by St. Juſt.

The accuſed deputies in their defence, particularly Barrere, contended that the operations of Robeſpierre extended to the Jacobins, the municipality, and the revolutionary tribunal, where he exercised an unlimited power; that it was notorious that Dumas, the president of that tribunal, Fouquier and Coffinthal went every morning to Robespierre's house, where they concerted their proscriptions and made out their lists of death and imprisonment. That the committee could not prevent this, since the convention itself, which had the power, was as well acquainted with these facts, and had not interfered at the period alluded to; that the six popular commissions for which a decree had been obtained by Robespierre, were delayed as much as possible by the other members of the committee, particularly by the accused, who at length had been threatened by Robespierre for the delay; that even then they contrived to complete only two of them, and in such a manner as fell short of the tyrant's wishes, since they had not an opportunity to do mischief. That with respect to the proscriptions being doubled during Robespierre's absence, it was the effect not of the committee's conduct or participation, but of the law which the convention had been seduced to pass on the twenty-second Prairial, a decree that was carried in the moment that it was drawn up by Couthon, who moved it before he had yet read it, and while the ink was yet wet as it came from the hand of Robespierre; that of this law the committee had neither a participation in the formation or the execution; and that Robespierre by absenting himself from the committee and having the full control of the police, directed the whole of his attention undivided to multiply the executions.

The trial of the deputies formally commenced before the convention on the twenty-second of March, but in the meantime Vadier escaped in the disguise of a public messenger, the deputies being placed in confinement in their own houses under charge of a gendarm only. They were ably defended by Lindet and Carnot, who insisted, that during the tyranny of Robespierre, the committee acted altogether under compulsion, and that the individual who should have dared to oppose him, must have been inevitably sacrificed. About this period Cambon was removed from the superintendance of the finances, but in a manner highly honorable to his probity.

A number of members in the convention, and of persons out of doors who still retained the hot passions of faction, took a deep interest in the accusation of the deputies. The Jacobin club had been re-opened by Billaud, and the debates there became as inflammatory as ever; there was also noticed at this period an uncommon influx of strangers, in the metropolis, and seditious speeches and exclamations became very frequent and alarming; foreign powers had again detached numerous emissaries into France, and an artificial scarcity indicated the success of their machinations and the adroitness with which they seized on the new state of party in the convention.

On the first of April the storm, that had been some time gathering, burst. An immense multitude from the suburbs proceeded to the hall of the convention, upon the pretence of petitioning for bread. At that moment Boissy d'Anglas was making a report on the means to provide a supply. He was interrupted by a tumult at the door, the insurgents forced the centinels, and the hall was filled with a concourse, exclaiming "bread and the constitution of 1793." The mountain or violent party seized the occasion to rouse the passions, Ruamps, Duhem, Chasles and others addressed them severally—the populace then spoke more explicitly, they exclaimed "we are the men of the fourteenth of July, the tenth of August, and the thirty-first of May"—and they added that they were determined to be free and no longer the victims of mercantile rapacity; "that the accused patriots should not be sacrificed to the passions of party." From ten o'clock till ſix in the evening this ſcene of riot prevailed, and conſternation marked every countenance; by that time the citizens had been rouſed to arms. Pichegru who was at Paris took the command of the public force amounting to 20,000, on the motion of Barras; peace was ſoon reſtored, and a number of thoſe who had inſpired the ſedition were ſeized and decreed to be ſent into confinement to the caſtle of Ham in Picardy, among theſe were Choudieu, Chaſles, Fauſſidore, Leonard Bourdon, Huguet, Ruamps, and Duhem; the liſt was afterwards augmented with the names of Thuriot, Bayle, Heutz, Maignet, Levaſſeur, Craſſoux, Cambon and Lecointre; the latter the accuſer of the three deputies, who alſo on the motion of Dumont were diſpoſed of. "Let us," ſaid Dumont, "aboliſh the puniſhment of death, but caſt out theſe monſters from ſociety." It was decreed that Barrere, Collot, and Billaud, ſhould be ſent to Guianna in South America, and that they ſhould be ſent off immediately.

On the next day after the ſuppreſſion of this tumult a committee was appointed to prepare the mode of organization of the laws of the republican conſtitution; conſiſting of Cambaceres, Merlin of Douay, Thibaudeau, Sieyes, Mathieu, Leſage, and Creuze-Latouche; and on the nineteenth Cambaceres produced the following decree on the ſubject, which was unanimouſly paſſed.

I. A commiſſion of eleven members ſhall be formed to prepare the organic laws. This commiſſion ſhall be appointed by nominal appeal on the twenty-firſt of April. It ſhall diſcuſs the means of action, with reſpect to the ſovereignty of the people, connexions with foreign powers, the finances, the public force, the legiſlative body, &c.

II. The plans on theſe different ſubjects ſhall be printed one decade after their being preſented. All citizens are invited to communicate their ideas with reſpect to the beſt organization of the conſtitutional code; and the commiſſion ſhall order the beſt conceived of theſe to be printed.

III. No limit is aſſigned to the labours of this commiſſion; but it is recommended to them to employ the greateſt celerity.

The committee appointed to this important function were Baudin, Durand, Maillane, Lanjuinais, Thibaudeau, La Reveilliere Lepaux, Leſage, Boiſſy D'Anglas, Creuze Latouche, Louvet, Bertier, and Daunou. In the meantime, after conſiderable diſcuſſion, a plan of proviſional government, till the conſtitutional act ſhould be completed, was adopted by the convention, and it was as follows:

I. The functions veſted in the different committees by the law of the ſeventh of Fructidor, are to remain in full force in every part that does not militate againſt the preſent decree.

II. The committee of public welfare is alone empowered to paſs arrets relating to the means of executing all matters that reſpect their actual functions and powers.

III. The expenditure ſhall be directed by the committees of public welfare and finance united into one ſection, compoſed of three members from each of the two committees.

IV. The union of the committees ſhall be by four commiſſioners ſent to the committee of public welfare by each of the committees, wiſhing to deliberate with that committee.

V. The committee of public welfare ſhall be divided into ſections, which ſhall all, in their reſpective departments, be charged with the correſpondence with, and with the ſuperintendence of, the executive commiſſions.

On the ſixth of May, Johannot preſented an important report to the convention, on the ſituation of the finances. He propoſed that the intereſt of the national debt and the annuities ſhould be paid in future with the utmoſt regularity, and that a ſinking fund ſhould be eſtabliſhed for the payment of the principal. "If the war ſhould laſt two years longer," ſaid he, "the republic will ſtill have ſeveral thouſand millions of livres applicable to the purpoſes of a ſinking fund" livres.

He ſtated the national property at - - - -	2,276,430,410
The national foreſts, occupying five millions of acres, he valued at	2,000,000,000
The lands of the emigrants, and ſome royal palaces, he valued at	15,226,280,220
The national domains in Belgium. - - - -	3,000,000,000
The whole amounting to - - - - -	22,502,710,630

making above eleven hundred millions pounds ſterling. The reporter aſſerted with the greateſt confidence, that this property was ſufficient to pay off the national debt, and all the expences of the war, even though its continuance ſhould be greatly protracted. Having enumerated the particulars of the reſources, he ſtated that theſe reſources would increaſe by the adoption of a good ſyſtem of mortgage. The committee propoſed that bills ſhould be iſſued on the ſecurity of the national property remaining unſold. It was alſo propoſed that the following funds ſhould be aſſigned for the payment of aſſignats:—the money due on the firſt Ventoſe, for the national property ſold, amounting to the ſum of 2,091,002,714 livres,—the produce of the houſes and buildings ordered to be ſold by lottery, valued at one thouſand millions. Deducting from the national property unſold, amounting to fifteen thouſand millions, the ſeven thouſand millions in bills of mortage, and one thouſand millions for rewarding the defenders of the country, there would ſtill be (the report ſtated) ſeven thouſand millions of livres entirely free and unappropriated.

On the 8th of May Fouquier Tainville, and fifteen others, were brought to trial for their crimes in the revolutionary tribunal; they were accuſed—1ſt, of having proſtituted the adminiſtration of juſtice. 2d. Of drawing out liſts of proſcription before trial for the gratification of private malevolence. 3d. Of ordering for execution pregnant women. 4th. Of trying to the number of ſixty perſons at one time and within the ſpace of three hours. 5th. Of having paid ſo little regard to juſtice that the father had been executed for the ſon and the ſon for the father. 6th. Of having refuſed priſoners a copy of their indictment. 7th. Of packing juries. All theſe charges were made good by ſubſtantial evidence; and the criminals were executed on the 9th, amidſt the execrations of thouſands.

The fate of theſe perſons ſhould act as a powerful warning to men entruſted with power or the adminiſtration of the laws; indignation never dies when it is created by ſuch atrocities, and the force of morals is ſo great on the human heart, that crimes are never forgotten and even the wicked are as ready to concur in puniſhing the mal-adminiſtratorso f the laws and the violators of freedom, as the virtuous.

In the courſe of the month of April the Swediſh government deputed the Baron Stael to Paris, and acknowledged the republic in a manner peculiarly frank and affectionate, the addreſs of the Swediſh king concluded thus—"We are making vows for the continual "increaſe of your proſperity, and we recommend you with all our heart to the divine "protection."

The moderation of the French in their conqueſt of the Dutch provinces has been already noticed, they terminated it by a compact no leſs glorious for themſelves than fortunate for the people of the ancient Batavia, which was the name they now reaſſumed. It was a ſtrange contraſt to conſider the Engliſh in Batavia as allies and friends, and their ſoldiers plundering and guilty of every ſort of violence; nay their officers, according to an account of one of themſelves, were accuſtomed to introduce their "horſes into the "Saloon and tye them up to the looking-glaſs:" While the French having conquered the whole nation, entered the provinces like brethren, and preſerved as much decorum as among their own homes; this moderation was the baſis of a treaty greatly advantageous to both parties; to the Batavians it was an act of re-creation and ſalvation; and in the courſe of the negociations of the ſubſequent years it became ſignally conſpicuous, by the glorious adherence of France to the proſperity of her allies, and by objecting to a peace which ſhould not be grounded on the reſtoration of thoſe territories belonging to the Batavian republic which had been betrayed into the hands of England by the perfidy of the Stadtholder, and the punic faith of that nation. The following are the leading features of the treaty.

I. The French republic reſtores from this moment all the conquered places and countries which have belonged to the ſeven United Provinces, from which, however, the frontier towns of the generality, ſuch as Maeſtricht, Venloo, Breda, Bergen-op-Zoom, with their reſpective territories, are excepted. The countries, of which both ſhores of the river Hond conſiſt, namely, on its right ſide, the iſlands South Beverland and Walcheren, and on its left, the ſtates of Flanders, muſt remain in the poſſeſſion of the French until their fate is decided; and this will wholly depend on the fate of Auſtrian Flanders. All the countries on this ſide of the Rhine and the Waal ſhall likewiſe be reſtored; but thoſe on the other ſide ſhall, until further orders, be occupied by the French military.

II. The French as well as the Batavians, ſhall enjoy without paying any tolls, the free navigation of the river Scheldt, the Rhine, and the Meuſe, and all their branches as far as the ſea.

III. The Batavians ſhall, for their part, pay to the French republic, the expences of the war which the latter has been compelled to make againſt the former. This payment, however, can be made good by amicable diſpoſitions; ſtill the Batavians are to make, without loſs of time, a proviſional payment, either in hard caſh or in good bills upon France or neutral countries, of twenty millions.

IV. The French republic acknowledges the independence and ſovereignty of the Batavian people.

V. The French republic to conclude an alliance, both offenſive and defenſive, with the Batavian republic.

VI. Neither the French nor the Batavians ſhall conclude peace, or make any other treaty, unleſs both parties participate therein.

The ſpirit that excited the late tumult at Paris had not yet been ſo effectually extinguiſhed as to prevent another on the ſame pretences; the baniſhment of the members to Havre, and their removal to the ſea-ports for tranſportation only, encreaſed the deſparation of thoſe who remained, and of the foreign emiſſaries who were deſirous of improving upon commotion. The ſcarcity of bread had been encreaſed notwithſtanding it was well known that the ſtock of corn was conſiderably more than ſufficient, and that the armies were now entirely ſupported by the countries conquered. Efforts were made to perſuade the people that the error lay with the legiſlature, nay ſeveral journals publiſhed the aſſertion. During the early part and middle of May placards were ſtuck up in great numbers in all the public places of the city, laying theſe charges to the convention. The deputies were ſtudiouſly inſulted in the ſtreets, and the troops were excited to riſe againſt the legiſlature. On the evening of the 19th a plan of inſurrection was openly diſtributed in the different ſections of Paris, prefaced with the motto—"Inſurrection is the moſt ſacred of duties." It concluded with a reſolution, that the citizens of Paris of both ſexes and of all ages ſhould without delay proceed in a maſs to the convention and demand bread—the abolition of the revolutionary government—the conſtitution of 1793—the diſſolution of the preſent convention, and the eſtabliſhment of another—the arreſt of each of the preſent members—the convocation of the primary aſſemblies on the 25th of Prairial, in order to renew the conſtituted authorities, and to replace the convention on the 25th of the enſuing Meſſidor."—The ralling exclamation was to be—"Bread and the conſtitution of 1793."

Early on the morning of the 20th of May the tocſin was rung in the ſuburb of St. Antoine and the generale beaten. Immediately on this alarm the convention aſſembled. The committee of public ſafety were informed on the preceeding night of the menaced commotion, and had taken precautions; as ſoon as the convention met, they preſented a report on the ſubject. A decree was immediately paſſed ordering all citizens to their reſpective ſections, out-lawing every perſon who ſhould head any commotion; and declaring their ſitting permanent. A proclamation was iſſued to the people and deputies appointed to reſtore order. The inſurgents in the meantime had crowded into the tribunes and inſulted the deputies; the gendarmes were ordered to clear them, and defend the convention. Several conflicts took place. Loud cries were heard in the environs of the Hall. A croud of women burſt into the galleries, exclaiming "bread and the conſtitution of 1793." Theſe cries were accompanied by menaces, and the deliberations of the convention were ſuſpended a while by the clamour. The venerable Vernier was preſident; with calm energy he commanded ſilence, and it was obeyed;—"We have ſeen," ſaid he, "women ſent as it were by deſign into the tribunes, and occaſionally go out to receive orders from the promoters of this diſorder. Let them know, that though theſe murmurs may produce a tempeſt, yet nothing can induce us to depart from our duty. They demand bread—and to provide bread is the conſtant object of our care.—Let the people know that diſorder will only ſtop the ſupplies of proviſions." The preſident then ordered the left galleries of the hall to be cleared, but without effect. General Hoche was appointed commandant of the armed force; he took an oath to the convention that he would enforce the reſpect due to it. The inſurgents at length obtained poſſeſſion of the hall, but ſome veteran ſoldiers repelled them, and for an hour and a half tranquillity prevailed. Suddenly a claſhing of ſwords and bayonets was heard, and a cry "to arms!" on all ſides; the noiſe approached the doors, detachments of the armed force traverſed the hall,—three guns were heard to fire, and a great crowd preſſed into the hall. A citizen ſnatched off the hat of one of the inſurgents which had written on it "bread and the conſtitution of 1793," the citizen was inſtantly aſſailed with ſabres. He flew to the tribune near the preſident, he was fired at and fell at the preſident's ſide—the repreſentative Ferraud ran to his aid, but he was felled to the ground with ſabres; he was killed in one of the corridores, and his head inſtantly put on a pike. Boiſſy d'Anglas, who in the courſe of this tumult took the preſident's chair, remained firm and immovable amidſt the violence, which continued to encreaſe. A drum was heard, and immediately there entered a number of armed men marching in regular order, and filling the whole hall, one of their leaders in the dreſs of a cannoneer read a paper in their name; he was repeatedly interrupted by acclamations; it was in ſubſtance the ſame as the placards of the preceding evening. This was about four o'clock in the afternoon, when the convention reſembled more a camp of armed men than a legiſlature. The greater part of the deputies had departed; thoſe who remained were principally favorites of the inſurgents. Duroi demanded the repeal of the law of the 5th Ventoſe which ſtruck the patriots confined at Ham; and the others ordered to be tranſported; theſe propoſitions were applauded by the inſurgents and decreed. But this was only a temporary triumph, Hoche had collected bodies of the national-guard and volunteer citizens which he poſted at all the leading avenues, ordering all to be permitted to paſs from, but none to approach the convention; while with a choſen body of citizens he entered the hall with the acclamations of "long live the convention!"—"Down with the factious!" The inſurgents were uſed with more lenity than they merited. Proclamation was made that all perſons who did not immediately retire would be liable to force. The multitude made their eſcape through the windows and by every means they could. When ſilence was reſtored, the pretended decrees paſſed in the tumult were repealed, and Duroi, Duqueſnai, and Bourbotte, who had been moſt active in countenancing the riot were put in arreſt.

The mountaineers and their adherents were not appaled by this diſcomfiture, they renewed the aſſault on the next day; and throwing aſide the diſguiſe of petitioners, took poſſeſſion of the place of the Carouſel and planted cannon againſt the hall of the convention; the convention was induced to ſend a deputation and to receive one from the inſurgents and to make promiſes. Theſe meaſures quieted them for that day, but on the 21ſt while the convention was purſuing its deliberations, the inſurgents were alſo deliberating on freſh means of attack. The convention had on the preceding evening declared the deliberative body of the inſurgents in a ſtate of out-lawry, and the tribunal had condemned to death the aſſaſſin of the deputy Ferraud; neither of theſe ſentences had effect, ſince the deliberations were continued, and the murderer was reſcued on the way to execution.

The illtimed lenity of the convention in ſending deputies, had enboldened the conſpirators. They were preparing to march again, when the Pariſians perceiving the danger, aſſembled in their ſections, and all the avenues of the Thuilleries were occupied by them. The convention now ſtrongly ſupported, decreed the ſuburb of St. Antoine, if it did not deliver up its arms, and the aſſaſſin of Ferraud, to be in a ſtate of rebellion; and the ſections were ordered to march againſt them. The inſurgents had meanwhile thrown up ſome works to defend the acceſſes to the ſuburb with a view to reſiſt, but the arrival of ſeveral regiments of the national-guard along with the ſections, and the ſuburb being ſuddenly ſurrounded on every ſide, they were alarmed; they were informed that no proviſions would be permitted to paſs in to them, and that if they did not ſurrender, their houſes would be laid in aſhes by a general bombardment. They offered ſubmiſſion upon capitulation, but the convention ordered Hoche to inſiſt on unconditional obedience, which was effected the ſame day. Among the priſoners taken were ſeveral of the gendarmes, who were led in triumph along with the cannon to the convention, the ſuburbs were all diſarmed, and the uſe of pikes forbid but againſt the enemy. The gendarmes were tried and executed; ſix of the deputies alſo were tried and condemned, three of them anticipated the executioner, the others ſuffered on the ſcaffold. The faction thus overthrown, the three members ordered to be tranſported were directed to be remanded for trial by the ſame tribunal, but before the courier had arrived the veſſel with Collot and Billaud had ſailed, Barrere being left behind at Oleron was brought back and committed to priſon. This inſurrection was accompanied by one that broke out at the ſame time in the departments; at Lyons the chief agents and coadjutors of Collot were put in priſon and maſſacred; nor was the ſpirit of vengeance confined to ſimple retaliation, the fanatical ſpirit of ſuperſtition was again rouſed, and under the pretence of cruſhing terroriſm and reſtoring religion the moſt terrible crimes were committed; under theſe colours the pious prieſt indulged his abhorrence of toleration, and the royaliſts of republicaniſm; ſocieties were formed under the title of companies of Jeſus and The Sun, which rivalled Robeſpierre in ;heir barbarities and exceeded him in the aggravation of their tortures.

On the ſame day, the twentieth of May, an inſurrection took place at Toulon alſo, in which Brunel, a repreſentative of the people, was killed. Niou another deputy then on board of the fleet haſtened to oppoſe the deſigns of the inſurgents, but in vain they inſiſted on the liberation of the terroriſts. The fleet was on the point of ſailing, but they were prevented, and the inſurgents took poſſeſſion of the gates of the town and mounted cannon on them. Shortly after they marched from Toulon on the way to Marſeilles, to the number of three thouſand with twelve pieces of cannon; but they were ſtopped by a force under generals Pactod and Charton, who defeated and carried three hundred of them priſoners to Marſailles. By this means Toulon was tranquillized.

The underſtanding that had taken place between the republic and the king of Pruſſia, upon the conferences at Frankfort hath been before furniſed; in Auguſt 1794, an agent of that monarch arrived at Baſle, named Smarz, a merchant of the Palatinate. The bad terms upon which the commanders of the allied armies ſtood, was notorious, but a total defection was not ſo much as ſuſpected, until the Pruſſians began to retreat towards and paſſed the Rhine. This ſtep was taken in order to ſound the diſpoſitions of the European powers, and to mark the degree of fermentation which his defection would excite. After ſome delay, on the firſt of October, 1794, the Pruſſian agent ſpread a report through Switzerland that a peace was concluded between the two powers, and this report was either ſo much approved or little blamed throughout Europe, that an actual negociation was opened, firſt by three Pruſſian agents officially diſpatched from the Pruſſian court, and afterwards by the baron Goltz avowed as an ambaſſador, who met Barthelemy on the part of France at Baſle. Goltz had formerly been ambaſſador at Paris, and his principles were known to be favourable to liberty. This negociation was in a ſtate of forwardneſs and nearly concluded, when the Pruſſian ambaſſador was taken off by poiſon. The body of the baron was opened and the fact was proved by the examination. This treachery of the combined powers anſwered the end for a time, as it afforded an opportunity to renew negociations with Pruſſia for a further continuance of the alliance; but after ſome time another perſon, Baron Hardenberg, was ſent to Baſle; he did not ſtop long, though the negociations were carried on by the ſecretary of legation, who aft-ſtopping at Paris and conferring with the committee of public ſafety returned to Berlin, and the treaty was ſoon after ſigned. Heſſe Caſſel alſo concluded a treaty with the republic, and Saxony and other powers withdrew their contingents from the allied armies. The duke of Wirtemberg began a negociation, but it was broken off by a temporary reverſe, which the French met with on the eaſtern ſide of the Rhine. The elector of Hanover, however, found it prudent to conclude a peace for his ſubjects, wherein he acknowleged the French republic! while as king of England he refuſed to acknowledge it or make peace!

The treaty with Pruſſia contained ſeveral ſecret articles, which occaſioned a diſcuſſion in the convention, when it was decided that ſecret articles might be entered into provided they did not militate againſt any of the public articles. A decree was paſſed on the ſubject which was afterwards incorporated with, and forms part of the conſtitution of the republic under the head of treaties.

The Pruſſian treaty was preſented to the convention by Reubel on the tenth of April, prefaced by a ſpeech, wherein he obſerved, that they were then reaping the firſt fruits of their principles. The coaleſced powers, who had ſworn the ruin of the republic were compelled to ſeek peace. The open treaty is to the following effect.

I. That there ſhall be peace, amity, and good underſtanding between the French republic and the king of Pruſſia, conſidered as ſuch, and as elector of Brandenburg, and as a co-eſtate of the Germanic empire. Every hoſtility between the contracting powers ſhall ceaſe from the ratification of the preſent treaty. Neither of them ſhall furniſh in conſequence any contingent, under any pretext, of men, money, horſes, proviſions, or ammunition to the enemies of the contracting parties, nor ſhall the one of the parties grant a paſſage through its territory to the troops hoſtile to the other.

II. The republican troops ſhall evacuate, within fifteen days after the ratification, that part of the Pruſſian territory which they occupy on the right bank of the Rhine. They ſhall continue to hold that part of the territory which they occupy on the left.

III. The arrangements with reſpect to the territory on the left bank of the Rhine are poſtponed until a general pacification ſhall take place between the republic and the Germanic empire.

IV. The commercial intercourſe between France and Pruſſia is eſtabliſhed on the ſame footing as it was before the commencement of the preſent war. Meaſures ſhall be taken to remove the ſcene of hoſtilities from the north of Germany.

V. All the priſoners, made on either ſide, ſhall be reſtored without any difference with reſpect to number or to rank, within three months at the lateſt.

VI. The republic will receive the propoſitions which ſhall be made by thoſe of the princes having poſſeſſions on the right ſide of the Rhine, in favour of whom the king of Pruſſia ſhall interpoſe.

VII. This treaty ſhall not have its full effect until it ſhall have been ratified by the contracting powers, at the lateſt within one month.

The negociation that had been opened by Spain was carried on but tardily, until the French troops were in full march for Madrid, when orders were diſpatched to D'Yrarte, the Spaniſh ambaſſador at Baſle to come to an immmediate concluſion. So great was the alarm and the diſpatch of the Spaniſh court on this occaſion, that two ſeparate negociations were going on at the ſame time; D'Iranda the Spaniſh miniſter had been ſent to Bayonne where general Servan was ſent to meet him, by the committee of public ſafety, but before they had an interview, peace was concluded at Baſle by D'Yrarte and Barthelemy.

This treaty conſiſted of twelve articles, and was ſigned on the twenty-ſecond of July, by it France relinquiſhed all her conqueſts on the Spaniſh territory and reſtored all the cannon and ammunition taken in the ſeveral towns. In conſideration of which Spain ceded to the republic all the Spaniſh part of St. Domingo with all the cannon and ammunition there. The republic agreed to accept the mediation of Spain in favour of Portugal, Sardinia, Naples, the duke of Parma, and all the other Italian princes. In all theſe treaties the Batavian republic was uniformly and ſpecially included.

Switzerland had during the progreſs of the revolution remained apparently neuter; but the ſpirit teſtified by ſeveral of the ariſtocratical cantons was extremely hoſtile to France. It was not till the Pruſſian treaty had been concluded, that Baſle recognized the republic; before that period Barthelemy was not acknowledged in his official character. Among the magiſtracy of Baſle who ſtood forward in promoting the Pruſſian treaty, and afterwards the recognization of the French republic, was the citizen Ochs, chancellor of Baſle, in whoſe houſe the Pruſſian ambaſſador reſided and who became himſelf the mediator between the two powers. In his houſe alſo was ſigned the Spaniſh treaty. In ſigning the Pruſſian treaty the uſual etiquette was altered in affixing the ſignatures; the Pruſſian miniſter ſigning firſt in the copy which he was to keep, and the French miniſter in that which was to be retained by the republic. In the courſe of May, a treaty, regarding the line of neutrality between France and Pruſſia, was ſigned.

The ſplendid ſucceſs of the French arms operated ſtrongly on the Swiſs Cantons, ſome of which, Soleure and Fribourg, had treated Berthelemy with great indignity, and had been excited by the numerous emigrants then in thoſe cantons to ſuch violent animoſity, that they were prevented from joining in hoſtility only by the moderate counſels of the democratic cantons of Zurich, Baſle and ſome others. The other cantons ſoon followed the example of Baſle in the recognization.

On the ninth of June the infant ſon of the late king expired in the Temple. The enemies of the revolution were active in aſcribing his death to poiſon. The charge was conſiſtent enough from thoſe who cauſed the baron Goltz to be poiſoned; but for ſuch a purpoſe there could not be an adequate motive; his conſtitution was always unhealthy, and the examination of able ſurgeons and phyſicians ſoon diſſipated the calumny. Penetrated with this event, or perhaps influenced by the general ſympathy, in the beginning of July, the committee of public ſafety propoſed the exchange of the daughter of the late king, for the deputies betrayed into the hands of the enemy by the traitor Dumourier, and the two ambaſſadors Semonville and Maret, who had been ſeized contrary to the law of nations upon neutral territories, by a body of Auſtrians, and ſince detained priſoners. After ſome heſitation the emperor acceded to this propoſal, and before the end of the year the exchange took place at Baſle.

The only one of the agents of Robeſpierre who diſtinguiſhed himſelf by cruelties, that now remained, was Joſeph Lebon. In the begining of July he was allowed to defend himſelf before the convention, which he did with great ingenuity. But it was decreed that there were grounds for trial, and he was ſent to Amiens, the ſcene of his cruelties, where he was tried and ſuffered death.

The commotions that had taken place in April and May, were found upon ſcrutiny to have been greatly fomented by ſtrangers then recently arrived in Paris. On the the thirteenth of July, a decree was paſſed concerning foreigners, which was as follows:—

I. All foreigners born in the territories with which the French republic is at war, and who have entered France ſince the firſt of January, 1792, are enjoined to depart from thence.

II. They ſhall quit the communes in which they reſide within the ſpace of three days, reckoning from the publication of the preſent law. They ſhall, beſides, be allowed one day for every ſeven leagues, between the place they are to quit, and the frontier.

III. They ſhall declare before the municipalities, and at Paris, before the civil committees of the ſection, what route they intend to take:—This route ſhall be deſcribed on the paſſports to be delivered to them.

IV. Every foreigner comprehended in the preſent law, who after the delay pointed out by the ſecond and third articles, ſhall be found on the territory of the republic, or who ſhall ſtray from the road traced out for him, ſhall be put under arreſt.

V. The diſpoſitions of the preceding articles ſhall apply to foreigners who, pretending to have been born in countries either allied or neuter, ſhall not be recogniſed and acknowledged by their reſpective ambaſſadors and agents.

VI. The following may continue in France: 1. foreigners born in the countries with which the republic is at war who came into France ſince the firſt of January, 1792, provided they have a known dwelling, or are vouched for by four citizens, houſekeepers, and diſtinguiſhed by their patriotiſm and their probity. 2. Foreigners born in the countries in friendſhip and alliance with France, who ſhall be acknowledged by the ambaſſador or agents of the powers with which the republic is at peace.

VII. To each foreigner there ſhall be delivered a paper containing his diſcription, with theſe words on the top—"Hoſpitality! Security!" The word "Fraternity" ſhall be added for foreigners born in the countries with which the republic is at peace.

VIII. Every foreigner found in a ſeditious aſſemblage ſhall be conſidered as a ſpy, and puniſhed as ſuch.

IX. Every foreigner, on his arrival at a ſea-port, or in a frontier commune of the republic, ſhall appear before the municipality. He ſhall there preſent his paſſport, which is to be immediately tranſmitted to the committee of general ſafety for examination. He ſhall, in the mean time, be under the charge of the municipal officers, who ſhall give him a proviſional card of ſecurity, pointing out that he is in their keeping.

X. The councils general of commune may nevertheleſs give authorizations to the merchants of allied or neutral countries who ſhall enter France. They ſhall communicate this to the committee of general ſafety, to which they ſhall ſend a collated copy of the paſſport, and an indication of the route the foreigner purpoſes to take.

XI. In the meaſures preſcribed by article IX. extraordinary couriers, as well as thoſe charged with miſſions to the convention, or the government committees, are not comprehended.

XII. The committee of general ſafety is charged to adopt every neceſſary meaſure for the execution of the preſent law.

While the events which we have juſt related were in agitation, the convention was ſeduloufly employed in digeſting the plan of the new conſtitution. It was preſented by a committee of eleven on the twenty-third of June, and introduced to the aſſembly by an excellent ſpeech of Boiſſy D'Anglas. Long and intereſting debates ſucceeded. The different articles were ſeparately diſcuſſed, and many referred back for reviſion. On the twenty-third of Auguſt the conſtitution was declared complete, and referred to the primary aſſemblies for their confirmation and acceptance.*

This conſtitution is not free from exceptions, produced in moments when diſtraction had not yet ceaſed, when war prevailed, and when factions were ſpirited up by foreign intrigues. There are parts, which though eſſential to the ſecurity of the republic, in the ſtage of war, appear calculated to reſtrain the public mind in the happier moments of peace. This conſtitution bears in many parts a reſemblance of the Athenian government in its happieſt periods; the council of ancients was common to both, and the directory reſemble the archons; but the French conſtitution poſſeſſes that ſuperiority which might have been expected to reſult from ſo many ages of experience. There is a cloſer reſemblance between other modern governments, and that of France in their operation, than at firſt appears from the external conſtruction; and it happily adopts the practically uſeful while it rejects the pernicious reſemblance. Thus the Engliſh monarchy and the American repreſentative government, leave the nominal execution of their laws and diplomatic proceedings to an executive, which is centred in an individual, under different circumſtances of perſonal and miniſterial reſponſibility. Theſe governments appears to be utterly unlike, and in truth in their forms and effects they are: but in their operation the different value and the likeneſs conſiſt. The Engliſh monarch though he has a direct negative on all laws, though he has the abſolute power of declaring war and making peace, without the conſent or participation of the legiſlature, is himſelf utterly exempt from reſponſibility, even if he were to accept a bribe, (and both Charles II. and William III. accepted bribes,) if he were to make war or to conclude peace under circumſtances the moſt fatal, he would be exempted from puniſhment of every kind, for it is an Engliſh maxim that the king of England is, like the pope, infallible, that he can do no wrong; but he poſſeſſes a privy-council, who are ſuppoſed to adviſe all his meaſures, and they may be puniſhed for their advice; thus this prepoſterous dilemma ariſes, that if the king himſelf authoriſes the moſt odious meaſures, the privy-council muſt either lay the blame on the king who is not reſponſible, or be puniſhed themſelves for guilt they have not committed; and advice, which may be the reſult of pure opinion is puniſhable.

The American executive cannot declare war nor make treaties without the conſent of a part of the legiſlature; neither can he put an abſolute veto upon laws. Yet there are circumſtances under which he may involve his country in the moſt fatal meaſures; but he is reſponſible; he is not authoriſed to have a privy council, but the Senate and vice-preſident are ſuppoſed to be his adviſers, and they participate in certain executive meaſures. He, however, has a kind of privy council conſiſting of the ſecretaries of ſtate, of the treaſury, of war, and a law officer; theſe are not appointed by the conſtitution, but like the Engliſh privy-council are the creatures of the executive officer's choice.

Thus in both governments are ſeen officers not appointed by the people directing the moſt delicate meaſures of government; in one the executive is not reſponſible, and in the other the ſenate, which participates in the executive duties, is the court before which the executive would be tried, if impeached for meaſures in which they participated; while another adviſing body exiſts who are not reſponſible for their counſels given in a character the functions of which the conſtitution does not deſignate, and which no law it is ſuppoſed could coerce merely for an opinion or advice, unleſs in common with any other individual of the community, they went to an open violation of the conſtitution.

* See the Conſtitution Appendix, No. III.

The French executive is not hereditary like the Engliſh, but it is elective like the American. It is free from the dangerous bias of a weak and wicked individual, becauſe the truſt and reſponſibility is divided among five members, who in their perſons are the actual deliberative council; in the two governments of England and America the deliberative executive powers are actually exerciſed by perſons unknown to the law. The French executive has miniſters, whoſe duties are deſignated by the conſtitution; they are alſo appointed by the executive, who are reſponſible for the acts of the miniſters, becauſe they are not allowed to do any act not ſpecially authoriſed. There are other circumſtances which give the French conſtitution a diſtinguiſhed pre-eminence over all others; particularly the attention that has been paid to the age of thoſe elected to the directory, and the council of the ancients; but above all the inability of the executive to conclude a treaty without the explicit ratification of the legiſlative bodies; the power of declaring war being placed in the legiſlature; the legiſlature only can propoſe and enact laws, and without any interference whatever from the executive. The reſemblance of perſons but not of powers then is ſimilar in the three governments, a plurality of perſons execute in fact; the French conſtitution alone appoints the executors. They have each two legiſlative chambers, but in England one is the creature of the executive by titular privileges, by creation, and by the influence of patronage; the other deſerves not the name of a repreſentative houſe. In America the ſenate is choſen in a manner which renders them totally independent of the people, which in fact creates a kind of intereſt to make the legiſlative and adminiſtrative function a diſtinct and ſuperior order to the people; and the length of ſervice eſpecially places it in the power of men, who might by vicious means arrive at ſuch ſtations to perpetrate the greateſt miſchief, before they could fear the ſalutary control of an election. The period of the French legiſlative duties is ſhort, and the opportunity of control in the people frequent. Upon the whole, though not free from imperfections, it is the moſt perfect form of republican government yet inſtituted.

On the 5th Fructidor (Auguſt 22d) previous to the tranſmiſſion of the conſtitutional act to the primary aſſemblies, the convention decreed that "the electoral bodies ſhould appoint the deputies to the legiſlative body, and that they ſhould chuſe two thirds from among the members of the convention;" and on the 13th they decreed "that in default of the election of two-thirds of the convention in the manner preſcribed, the convention ſhould fill up the vacancies."

Theſe latter decrees met with conſiderable oppoſition in Paris; in the departments they did not meet ſo much; as it was acknowledged that the neceſſity of preſerving an uniformity of vigor in the preſent circumſtances of the revolution, pointed out the neceſſity of keeping the ſame perſons in the exerciſe of the public functions; the danger of factious influence was alſo acknowledged. Few only of the ſections of Paris accepted theſe laws, which were called of the 5th and 13th of Fructidor. The fears of faction that had been anticipated were realized to more alarming extent than had been preſuppoſed. The emigrants and foreign powers had taken early measures to obtain an influence in the primary assemblies; two species of societies were organised throughout all France, one of these consisted wholly of decided royalists, who corresponded with each other and prepared measures to operate upon the other societies, which consisted of men who were avowed philanthropists, men who were not adverse to liberty, but, either from habit or terror, wished for any change that could produce peace and repose; this class of persons was publicly announced under the name of philanthropists, adverse to war from principle, but not attached to monarchy; great care was necessary on the part of the royalists to manage them; this however they did by means of the royalist clubs, whose meetings being private enabled them to blend themselves with and assume the language and wishes of the philanthropists; by this means they had constant opportunities of exciting hatred of the leading parties in the convention, and promoting any object that appeared likely to remove them from power and put persons apparently more agreeable to their pacific and humane views into the legislature. In many of the departments the royalists were successful to the full extent of their hopes; but in others they were disappointed; and the audacity of the known royalists, who notwithstanding repeated decrees, had been yet suffered to rest undisturbed in France, now became such as to render the whole energy of the republican party necessary to prevent the total overthrow of all that had been done to establish the republic.

The scene which Paris exhibited at this epocha was solemn and interesting. It was the assembly of a considerable portion of a great nation called together for the most important duty of civilized society. The meetings of the primary assemblies were conducted with the utmost decorum and dignity. Next to the chairs and desks of the president and secretaries, the old men of the section were seated, and around and behind them were ranged the younger citizens. Every person was allowed to deliver his sentiments and was heard with candour and indulgence. In some of the sections, however, the conspiracy was too violent and visible to be mistaken. It was maintained in some of them, that when the people were convocated all laws of regulation belonged to themselves, and having named electors these became the immediate representatives, and had a right to assemble when they thought expedient. This assumption was calculated to anticipate the proceedings which might take place on the day appointed by the convention for the meeting of the electors. Accordingly in the suburb of St. Germaine, a body of electors to the amount of one hundred assembled in the hall of the French theatre, before the appointed day, and having chosen De Nivernois (formerly the duke) chairman, proceeded to debate upon political subjects then before the convention. This body alarmed at such proceedings, and not ignorant of the machinations which were then carrying on, ordered a corps of military to disperse them as an illegal meeting, which they effected without violence or tumult. In the meantime the acceptance of the constitution and the two decrees was perfected by a vast majority of the primary assemblies. Cavils were set up against the votes of the assemblies, upon the pretext that they did not understand the decrees!— These factious proceedings were carried to such a height by nocturnal assemblies, and a number of journals recently established fraught with anti-republican doctrines and declamations, and the number of strangers daily augmenting and appearing in Paris; that the committees of government were obliged to call a considerable armed force to the neighbourhood of the capital, and to defend the convention. The factious and the deluded populace were buoyed up with the persuasion, that the military would not draw their ſwords againſt the private citizens, and in this they were ſtrongly confirmed by the good underſtanding that then ſubſiſted between them and thoſe in the camp, which, ſince the inſurection of Prairial, (the preceding May,) had been pitched ſometimes at Marly and Sablons.

It was now publicly aſſerted in the turbulent gazettes, that means much more forcible than remonſtrances were neceſſary to bring the convention to reaſon. That aſſembly was repreſented as a body of aſſaſſins and tyrants, that they ought to be driven from their ſeats with ignominy, and that if they were ſuffered even to exiſt as private citizens it muſt be from the ſpecial indulgence and lenity of their country.

Others were not even ſo moderate. Retaliation was inſiſted on; and there were thoſe who wiſhed to puniſh not only the authors of the death of the Gironde and Danton, but of Robeſpierre, and of Hebert! Priſons were even named for the deputies, and meaſures declared to be taken to carry this immenſe plan into execution. Along with theſe denunciations the publiſhers conſtantly and with great vehemence inſiſted on their being pure republicans!

For ſome days alarm was very viſible in the capital; every day the menaces became ſtronger and more violent. Freſh troops were meanwhile pouring into the capital and its neighbourhood; but the factions confidently expected that when ordered to fire, the military would ground their arms. Whether the convention entertained the ſame apprehenſions, or whether it was from an impreſſion that many of thoſe who had been confined as terroriſts, were only miſtaken in their attachments, and capable by their energy of ſerving their country in the hour of danger, they were privately releaſed, and appointed to ſtations ſuited to their capacities and influence. This meaſure was however diſcovered, and the antipathies of the royaliſts and counter-revolutioniſts, were now converted into rage and deſparation. It was to them the ſignal of danger and the invocation to battle.

On the twelfth of Vendemiare (October the fourth) general Menou, commander of the military force, was ordered to proceed with an armed corps to the ſection of Lepelletier to diſperſe the inſurgents and ſeize their arms. The general inſtead of executing the meaſures as directed, entered into conferences with the inſurgents, and conſented to withdraw his force. The convention reprehended him, and he was broke by the committees. At midnight the drums were beat, and at the doors of ever houſe were heard the cries—"To arms."—"Every citizen to his ſection."—"Liberty or death." Yet this alarm did not produce the purpoſed effect, the morning of the fifth of October preſented no indication of hoſtile movements; but at noon the inſurgents were in motion; a body was directing its march towards the Thuilleries; another had taken poſſeſſion of the church of St. Roche, and lined the ſtreet of St. Honoré, while on the ſouthern ſide of the river the quays were lined, by corps advancing in the ſame direction towards the convention. On the north ſide an action commenced, both parties accuſed each other of firing firſt; but while the conflict was carrying on, the ſouthern inſurgents had reached as far as the quay of Voltaire, to join their aſſociates; the cannon of the conventional force were placed ſo as to rake their whole column from the elevation of the bridge. At this ſide the inſurgents had no artillery, and the troops of the convention acted with great lenity; they did not fire until the inſurgents were about to force the paſſage acroſs the bridge, when a volley was ordered to be fired in ſuch a manner as that the ſhot ſhould paſs above their heads. A few nevertheleſs were killed, who were on a riſing ground, upon which the whole diviſion diſperſed. The battle on the north ſide, near the convention, was a ſerious one, and more obſtinate. The inſurgents ſeveral times acted ſo vigorouſly that they took pieces of cannon from the patriotic force, which were as conſtantly retaken. After four hours conteſt the inſurgents were compelled to retreat; the church of St. Roche was taken with great ſlaughter; and the inſurgents fled to their general rendezvous in the ſection of Lepelletier. After an interruption of two hours the cannon were heard once more, and ceaſed firing only with midnight, when the conventional force had overcome all oppoſition. The number killed in this inſurrection has been variouſly eſtimated, but it is generally allowed to have amounted to 800. Soon after this diſagreeable affair, ſeveral of the inſurgents were ſeized, and among the papers of one of them named Le Maitre, were found complete proofs of a criminal correſpondence with what was called the committee of Baſle, compoſed wholly of emigrants, of whom he was the agent. He was executed and his correſpondence publiſhed.

In this action the celebrated Barras, who had diſtinguiſhed himſelf in the ſame ſituation on the fall of Robeſpierre, commanded the armed force. He it was who announced to the convention at midnight the triumph over the inſurgents. The convention had ſuſpended its deliberations and waited with anxiety the reſult of the conflict; they immediately formed a houſe, and Barras ſtated to them that the inſurgents were largely compoſed of emigrants, ex nobles, and chouans from the departments. In conſequence of this inſurrection the cit-zens were called upon to deliver up all arms for the public ſervice. Thus ended this diſaſtrous day and its conſequences. No further oppoſition was made. A commiſſion of five members was propoſed to be appointed to conſult upon proper meaſures of public ſecurity; this was oppoſed in the convention by Thibaudeau and Lariveilliere Lepaux, and the energy of theſe two members rouſed the convention to a ſenſe of danger that might reſult from adopting ſuch a meaſure, and it was rejected; from thence to the termination of its labours the convention continued tranquil.

On the twenty-ſeventh of October the convention ſat for the laſt time. Its laſt meaſures were honorable to its wiſdom and liberality; two decrees were paſſed for the abolition of the puniſhment of death on the concluſion of peace, and for an amneſty. From the amneſty were excepted perſons concerned in the laſt inſurrection—perſons oppoſing the new conſtitution—forgers of aſſignats—tranſported prieſts—and the emigrants.

Thus terminated the proceedings of an aſſembly whoſe hiſtory is in all reſpects more extraordinary than that of any other body of men upon record. Theſe times will require an hiſtorian uniting the comprehenſion of Tacitus, the dignity of Thucydides, and the impartiality of Gibbon, to illuſtrate their glorious actions and culpable exceſſes. Compoſed of philoſophers, men of letters, poets, painters, actors, phyſicians, and a multitude of lawyers, they with a bold and nobly daring hand ſigned the death-warrant of the ſucceſſor of an hundred kings, and in one day broke the ſceptre over which fourteen centuries of exiſtence had thrown the hoary veil of ſuperſtitous ſanctity; this extraordinary aſſembly whoſe ſagacity penetrated every arcanum of civil, religious and political inſtitution; who drew from the ſtores of hiſtory thoſe immenſe deſigns which enabled them to outſtretch modern civilization, and progreſs in leſs than three ſhort years over the paths of policy and knowledge with a celerity and effect that would ſeem to require an age to realize it; who ſaw in the trivial deſignations of titular diſtinctions the greateſt ſource of ſocial evil; and unanimouſly aboliſhed them:—who diſcerned in the petty jealouſies of locality, the rivalſhip of diſtricts, and the invidious aſperities caſt on countries and names, a ſpecies of chains by which the human character was tied down to an unjuſt odium, and to a conſequent reſentment, and boldly diſſolved them;—who blending the vaſt elements of philoſophy with civil policy, aboliſhed even the names of countries and made them to live in new characters coeval with and eternal as the glory that produced them;—who ſeeing and feeling the heavy and inſupportable weight of a bigotted cankerous hierarchy, an uſeleſs or a profligate and burdenſome prieſthood, relieved thirty-ſix millions of people from their oppreſſions, by an unequalled and wonderful reformation: who harmonized the calendar with the order of the ſeaſons, and with the ſimplicity of nature and reaſon. It was this body of men who, when their country was betrayed by Dumourier; Valenciennes ſurrendered, and Toulon betrayed for Engliſh gold; the king of Pruſſia under the walls of Landau; and ninety leagues extent in the weſt devoured by an hundred and fifty thouſand Vendeans; publiſhed a decree which converted France into an army of heroes—which produced fourteen hundred thouſand men, capariſoned to repel invaſion, and generals from obſcurity who were to ſurpaſs the greateſt heroes of claſſi c valor; they who repulſed the king of Pruſſia, defeated the Auſtrians, and drove the boaſted legions of England before them like whelps before the lion, with woeful and agonizing ſteps; ſoldiers whom neither death, wounds, peril, nor the wan t of food, clothing, and every human comfort could appal; whom neither danger nor want—the tornado nor the moſt unexampled froſt, could reſtrain from the purſuit of conqueſt, when the ſafety and juſtice of their country called for their ſervices, and thoſe unexampled ſacrifices, were neceſſary to ſecure them.

THE REPUBLIC.

THE members elected to the new legiſlature immediately proceeded to the verification of their powers agreeably to the conſtitution; which being completed, their firſt taſk was the election of the new executive power, compoſed of five directors. This election gave riſe to ſome intrigues. No ſooner had liberty aſſumed the aſpect of mildneſs and benignity and endeavoured to heal the wounds of the revolution, than the royaliſt party, whoſe deſparate hopes graſped at the moſt unſubſtantial illuſions, endeavoured to convert every movement of the government to its diſadvantage or its overthrow. In conjunction with the unfortunate prieſts they ſtimulated the paſſions of the ignorant or the well-meaning religious; and ſheltering their purpoſes beneath the marks of benevolence, of humanity, of tenderneſs, of charity, and of indignation, never ceaſed to load with opprobrium the ſurvivors even after the authors of the revolutionary crimes had been ſacrificed to juſtice; by this means, and various machinations, thouſands of virtuous and well diſpoſed men were led aſtray, and diſaffection to the government promoted. Even many of the ſincereſt republicans were by the induſtrious wickedneſs of their enemies thus deceived, and jealouſies between them continually kept alive.

Theſe ſecret meaſures were moſt aſſiduouſly employed to influence the election of the directory; and the ſucceſs which they had met in returning ſeveral members to the legiſlature by their activity in the primary aſſemblies, they hoped to produce an election, ſuitable as circumſtances could admit, to their wiſhes. It had been the policy of the royaliſts, as ſoon as they found the charm of royalty no longer work upon the nation, to co-operate with that party which was either moderate in its plans, or oppoſed to thoſe in the adminiſtration of the government. It was by this policy, that they always preſerved a few members devoted to them in the convention; and it was thus they largely contributed to influence the public opinion againſt the Girondiſts and to produce their fall by ſupporting the violence of Robeſpierre. The republicans were not inſenſible of the efforts of the royaliſts, and though there ſtill ſubſiſted a degree of irreconcilement between the reſtored deputies of the Gironde and thoſe that remained of the mountain; they ſacrificed their reſentments to the ſafety of their country and agreed to elect members to the directory from both parties. The firſt of theſe was Reveilliere-Lepaux, formerly a lawyer, and of the Gironde party, who had the honor of ſharing in the proſcriptions of Robeſpierre, and had been obliged to conceal himſelf to preſerve his life. His integrity and devotion to the cauſe of civil liberty had procured him the general confidence of the convention. His devotion to letters was well known, and he had diſtinguiſhed himſelf particularly by his botanical reſearches: he wiſhed to decline the appointment, but the ſolicitations of thoſe who knew the value of his integrity in ſuch a ſtation in ſuch times prevailed upon him. Reubel a native of ancient Alſace, alſo a lawyer, diſtinguiſhed in the conſtituent aſſembly, for the energy, the frankneſs, and activity of his character. He it was with Sieyes that formed a treaty with the Batavian republic. He had been one of the earlieſt Jacobins, and one of the moſt diſtinguiſhed advocates of the republican inſtitution; he was alſo one of the moſt zealous in overthrowing the Jacobins when the club became the rendezvous of royaliſts and other aſſaſſins. Great penetration, an enlarged knowledge of mankind, and the moſt ſtubborn inflexibility in right, are ſaid to be his characteriſtics. Letourneur of Manche, the third perſon ſelected, was an officer of engineers before the revolution; he ſpent ſome years in America, under Bellecombe, and was always conſidered as one of the moſt ſincere though never a clamorous republican. He adhered rather to the energetic party of the Jacobins and the mountain in the convention, but his enemies have not charged him with any of their vices. Sieyes, a man of letters, a philoſopher, a conſpicious leader in the revolution; a royaliſt writer of high reputation,* has alledged that three men only produced the republic, Sieyes, is one of them Briſſot and Condorcet are the others. No doubt Sieyes had a ſhare in it but the royaliſts' declaration appears rather hyperbolical. He was the author of the table of the rights of man drawn up in the conſtituent aſſembly. This man's talents require no better illuſtration than that he has been conſpiciouſly abuſed. His work entitled "what is the third eſtate?" has been noticed in the early part of this hiſtory, and that work certainly had a great ſhare in opening the public mind to the diſcuſſion of a topic which had not been before that period very generally inveſtigated. He declined accepting the office of a director. Barras was the fifth perſon choſen. He had been a viſcount, but had from the firſt dawn of the revolution diſplayed his attachment to the republican ſyſtem, and his contempt for the privileges to which the accident of birth had entitled him. He was a military man, and an early member of the Jacobins. His intrepidity was ſignalized on three important occaſions of inſurrection, on the overthrow of Robeſpierre, the inſurrection of the ſuburb of St. Antoine on the twentieth of May, and the laſt inſurrection which attacked the convention called the inſurrection of Vendemiare, when he ſubdued the ſections. According to the conſtitution the council of five hundred gave in a liſt to the council of ancients from which theſe names were ſelected. As Sieyes declined, another election took place, and Carnot was choſen; Cambaceres having a few votes leſs than Carnot.

* Malet du Pan.

Carnot was bred in the engineers corps, and was alſo diſtinguiſhed by literary acquiſitions. But his moſt diſtinguiſhed qualifications were military; he it was who during the moſt critical ſtage of military conteſt and factious convulſion, ſuperintended and combined thoſe vaſt projects in the military department, which according to the emphatical language of Barrere organiſed victory.

The palace of the Luxembourg was appointed for the reſidence of theſe executive officers, which now aſſumed the name of the directorial palace. A ſplendid coſtume was allotted to the members of the directory, in which ſoon after their inſtalment they gave audience, and in which by the conſtitution they were obliged to appear; and a ſuitable guard was attached to them.

The benevolent amneſty which had been one of the laſt acts of the convention had now nearly proved the ruin of the conſtitution, of which that meaſure was intended to be the happy and conciliating harbinger. The priſons had been thrown open, and the conduct of thoſe that were releaſed only diſplayed the juſtice of their confinement and the miſtaken lenity of exonerating them from a formal trial for their crimes. The members who had been confined at Ham, had been liberated among the reſt. Theſe factious men now thronged the public places, and the royaliſts had taken advantage of the amneſty to croud to the metropolis. Signs of diſtinction were aſſumed by which they were known to each other, and it was ſoon generally underſtood that this particular mark was a green cravat. The theatres became the rendezvous of the ſeditious, and the powers of poetry and muſic were called forth to ſpirit up inſurrection. The "Reveil du Peuple" was the favourite of the factious, the favourite of the republicans was the Marſeillois Hymn. The directory was at length obliged to interfere, and ſhut up ſeveral of theſe theatres of ſedition.

Some troubles were created in the ſouthern departments about the ſame time; Freron was detached thither and made many changes at Marſeilles, Toulon, Aix, and other places; complaints were ſent from the aggrieved places to the directory, who removed Freron, and reprimanded him, but ſupported the changes which he had made; they ſent a conciliatory addreſs to the ſouth, and the diſquietude was ſucceeded by more orderly proceedings.

It was ſoon evident, however, that a faction was ariſing in the body of the new government. The republicans had been reconciled with few exceptions to each other; and thoſe ſincere republicans who were any wiſe adverſe to the meaſures produced under the new conſtitution, were rather actuated by pure motives or deceived by artful men, than by any ſiniſter or unworthy deſigns. But there were men with motives leſs pure, and covered only by forms, ardently ſought to overturn the conſtitution. There is always attached to thoſe who oppoſe the meaſures of government a ſpecies of neceſſary reſpect, which ariſes from the known univerſal proneneſs of men in power to abuſe it, and which of neceſſity juſtifies a vigilant and energetic ſcrutiny of all their meaſures and actions. But it cannot be denied that men in purſuit of power may be as much addicted to injuſtice and vicious views as thoſe who poſſeſs it. The royaliſt members, and in the convention there were ſome who were and had always been avowedly ſuch, and who had only eſcaped the rigor of the conventional decrees, by their adroitneſs on evading arreſt, or under the late amneſty. Theſe now profeſſed a perfect reſignation to the conſtitution, they affected to be ſatisfied that the nation wiſhed for the republican conſtitution, and that they were therefore bound to abide by the deciſion of the majority; but they never failed to add, that the conſtitution was not entirely perfect, and that great care was neceſſary to preſerve the public happineſs and liberty by watching over its execution with vigilance. Such arguments were in themſelves not only plauſible, but carried all the appearance of earneſtneſs, candor, and conviction; and it was not ſurpriſing that upon a ſubject which was ſuſceptible of a great variety of opinions, that honeſt men might really entertain a ſpecies of reaſoning, which others affected, as moſt conducive to promote their views. The two councils ſoon diſplayed theſe characters, but particularly the council of five hundred; and the ſtrange ſpectacle was exhibited of thoſe who had been mountaineers, jacobins, and cordeliers, ranked on the ſide of moderation and the conſtitution; and Feuillans, conſtitutionaliſts, and monarchiſts, declaiming for the republic, for energy, and the liberty of the preſs. This ſtrange reverſion of things was not unnoticed by the principal leaders in the revolution, who ſaw with ſorrow many honeſt men deceived by the affected candor of their known enemies. The royaliſts had already formed clubs, and the republicans were compelled to reſort to a ſimilar meaſure, which had always been an important auxiliary to the counteraction of conſpiracy. Among the new third were ſeveral men of talents known royaliſts, particularly Portalis, Lemerer, Coudrai, Jourdain, and Dumolard, theſe were the leading characters of the royaliſt club, and they had attached to their views others of the new third as Dupont of Nemours, and ſome of the moſt reſpectable of the old convention as Lanjuinais, and Boiſſy d'Anglas.

The republican club was compoſed of Legendre, Louvet, Tallien, Chenier, and Sieyes, and generally of all the moſt moderate of the earlier Jacobins, and of the ſurvivors of the Girondiſts; and theſe cordially co-operated with the government, the other formed the oppoſition party.

In the progreſs of the two following years, the effect of theſe new combinations became every day more and more viſible, and the directory were not long inſenſible that meaſures were in operation between the agents of foreign powers and members of the legiſlative bodies. Their prudence, however, was equal to their vigor, and while they adopted the moſt vigilant meaſures to detect and fruſtrate conſpiracy, the conſtitution diſplayed all the energy that was viſible under the committees, and the moſt orderly police; the nation was ſeen returning to its natural regularity, and trade and commerce once more aſſumed the chearful aſpect of confidence and activity; the public credit, ſo much depreciated by ſtock jobbing and foreign forgery, acquired freſh ſtrength; in the public ſervice every ſpecies of fraudulent conduct was chaſtiſed; the carreer of juſtice was moderate, firm, and uniform, and the people beheld in the midſt of war a degree of ſecurity and equitable adminiſtration which realized the bleſſings of freedom, and taught them how great and happy their country muſt be upon the reſtoration of peace. They ſaw at the ſame time the armies purſuing their triumphs with their accuſtomed ſucceſs, and the coalition, which had threatened to overwhelm the liberties of Europe, already rent aſunder.

Soon after the inſtalment of the directory, its wiſdom was diſplayed in an eſtabliſhment the moſt ſplendid and important that has ever appeared in civilized ſociety. They publiſhed a proclamation addreſſed to the nation, declaring their conviction that the happineſs of the French people was inſeparable from the perfection of the arts and ſciences, and the encreaſe of human knowlege—and deſiring to manifeſt in a ſolemn manner to France and to all civilized nations, its firm reſolution to concur as far as its power extended to the progreſs and encouragement of ſcience; it founded a national inſtitution compoſed of one hundred and forty-four members, whom it had appointed, and ordered their inſtalation to take place in the hall of the former academy of ſciences in the palace of the national muſeum, formerly the royal palace of the Louvre. Among the members were found the names of Le Lande, Fourcroy, Volney, Raynal, La Place, Bertholet, Marmontel, Bitauby, Garat, Francois of Neufchateau, the celebrated abbé de St. Pierre, Paſtoret, &c. This proclamation was ſanctioned by the legiſlative body; the meetings were to be held four times every year, and the various departments of ſcience were occupied by the ableſt profeſſors of France.

A plan of inſtruction conformable to the conſtitution was alſo eſtabliſhed. It conſiſts of what are called primary ſchools, erected in each canton, where a maſter is appointed for the boys, and a miſtreſs for the girls, where they are to remain until their twelfth year; at theſe ſchools are taught the elementary branches of reading, writing, and the firſt elements of arithmetic: a central ſchool is eſtabliſhed in each department, with nine profeſſors, to teach ancient languages, natural hiſtory, belles lettres, mathematics, drawing, experimental philoſophy, grammar, and legiſlation; the profeſſors are not choſen by patronage but by a departmental jury; they have a ſtipend equal to that of the adminiſtrators of departments, and may retire upon the ſtipends after twenty-five years ſervice. Each central ſchool has a library and librarian, a cabinet of natural hiſtory, an apparatus of experimental philoſophy and a botanical garden. There are beſide ſpecial ſchools for particular profeſſions as the military and mechanical. Five ſpecial ſchools for the higher ſciences as aſtronomy, medicine, and ſurgery; theſe ſchools to be augmented to ten. There will alſo be a ſpecial ſchool for the oriental languages: education in all theſe ſeminaries to be at the public expence, and every individual has a right to ſend his child, but the parents if able muſt ſupport the child. The national inſtitute has no authority over the ſchools.

During the progreſs of theſe important tranſactions in the capital, the affairs in the departments were undermined by conſpiracy, and at length revolt was once more kindled on the ruins of Vendee. The conduct of the leaders of the inſurgents even in their ſurrender was gloomy, ſullen, and ſuſpicious; it was the ſubmiſſion of a broken hope, that truſted to fortune for a future reparation; it was not the return of virtue to the ſober path of peace from the conviction of a tempory deluſion, but the accommodation of diſappointed fanaticiſm to a pauſe which promiſed more ſucceſs by hypocriſy than open conflict. The truce was a perfidious one, and accepted only to retrieve the waſted ſtrength and reſources of the rebels. The republican generals never failed to declare theſe ſentiments, and to caution the government againſt an implicit confidence in the attachment of the revolters. The ſubmiſſion of the Chouans was not completed at the latter end of March, when a ſtrong body of royaliſts took poſſeſſion of Fremont, notwithſtanding the inhabitants of that town reſiſted them. General Beauregard, however expelled them thence, without more than eight lives loſt. It was aſſerted that theſe men did not belong to the leaders who ſubmitted; the truth was, that as they eſcaped into the woods of Jumaux it could not be determined to whom they belonged, or wherein their views agreed with, or differed from the others. Little trouble however occured from thence to the middle of May; on the thirteenth of that month, Ruelle who had been the moſt ſucceſsful deputy in producing the ſubmiſſion of the inſurgents, reported to the convention that the Chouans had delivered up a million of forged aſſignats that had been recently landed from an Engliſh ſquadron, which hovered on the coaſt of ancient Brittany. This circumſtance teſtified at leaſt the ſincerity of ſome of the reconciled people. But it ſoon appeared that this fleet was engaged in a ſecret and cloſe correſpondence with the royaliſts in Vendee, that a plan which was ſometime forming in England, was now about to be unfolded, and that numbers of emigrants had already been landed on various parts of the French coaſt. The government had early intelligence of the ſcheme carrying forward in England, and the commiſſioners in the departments, were enabled in May not only to detect the correſpondence, but to ſeize upon Cormartin and ſix others of the Chouan chiefs concerned. The correſpondence ſhewed that the conſpiracy was of unuſal extent, that immenſe preparations were making of arms, ammunition, ſtores, and clothing, which with all the emigrants in England, and a vaſt ſum of money were to be ſpeedily brought in a powerful Engliſh fleet. About the latter end of May the Chouans began to embody in conſiderable force, and they blockaded Grand Champ on the twenty-ſeventh, with a body of 1200 men. The deputy Bue, however, attacked them impetuouſly the next day with a body of republicans, and coming up with the army of the Chouans, amounting to 6,000 men, encamped at the old caſtle of Reſte, ſurpriſed the chiefs of the Chouans in their beds, defeated the whole body and diſperſed them.

In England the preparations for this grand expedition were carried on at an expence and with a ſyſtematic order, that appeared to promiſe ſome ſtroke that would change the fate of the war. The emigrants were embodied into regiments, called of D'Autichamp, De Viomeſnil, De Bethiſy, De Montemarte, De Caſtries, De Dreſnay, and De Hervilly, theſe corps were in Engliſh pay; and their eſtabliſhment was guaranteed in a formal compact executed by the Engliſh ſecretary of ſtate, Grenville, the Engliſh ſecretary at war, Windham, and the emigrant French duke De Harcourt. The principal projector of this new inſurrection according to an intelligent royaliſt writer,* was a Monſieur

* Malet Du Pan.

Rouer, and the design he considers as meriting the greatest admiration for its extent and object. The English minister of war Windham had entered into the design with all his soul, and a Monsieur Puissaye, who had before been conspicuous for his utter incapacity, was the person chosen to conduct it. With this man was united the count D'Hervilly a man of military reputation. By a strange combination of contradictions, Puissaye was not to command until he reached the French coast, meanwhile the embarkation and conduct of the expedition was entrusted to D'Hervilly, who on landing was to become quarter-master general to Puissaye. D'Hervilly did not it appears solicit to be employed in this service, but had been sent for to the Rhine, as well as the count de Sombreuil, by the English ministers. These two officers were young and much distinguished in their profession, and went on this service not so much from a confidence in its utility, as from a sense of honor which would not permit them to recede from danger.

It was determined that 4,000 of the troops should be embarked on board a small squadron under the command of commodore Warren, as the advanced guard of this expedition. This was effected in the beginning of June, and the squadron consisting of two ships of 74 guns, six frigates, with a number of transports having the troops on board, arrived on the coast of France on the sixteenth of that month, and anchored between the island of Dieu and Normoutier. D'Hervilly, who had little previous knowledge of Puissaye, during the voyage endeavoured to acquaint himself with his sentiments and projects; but was astonished to find that this chosen and confidential commander had no certain information of the disposition of the people in Brittany, nor any determinate idea of the place in which an impression was to be made. He therefore determined in his own mind upon two points in the bay of Quiberon, those of Crac and Carnac. On the twenty-fifth of June the fleet conducted by a pilot-boat which carried a white flag entered the bay of Quiberon, and anchored there. D'Hervilly landed here to obtain information in his department, and several spies were sent abroad. D'Hervilly held several conferences with the inhabitants in the village of Carnac, but from what he learned, nothing flattering to the project was apparent, and he signified as much to the English commodore and Puissaye; but they were of a contrary opinion, and on the evening of the twenty-sixth the boats of the fleet were manned, and the soldiers to the amount of 2500 were embarked on them, and continued so all night ready for action. At break of day they made good their landing near the village of Carnac. Two hundred republicans made a feint shew of resistance, and it was justly supposed that this must have been only an advanced guard of a larger body, or else the country must not be in that state of readiness to assist the landing which was alleged. The troops were put into cantonments in the villages. Puissaye fixed his head quarters at Genese, a very good position, the loyal emigrants occupying the front, other corps on his right and left, and both flanked by the bay, the artillery being in the rear of the half circle. D'Hervilly with a few horse reconnoitred the neighbourhood, and at a small but important post of mount St. Michel, found the white flag flying as well as at Carnac; he continued his circuit as far as Plouarnal, which the republicans had abandoned the same morning; here he was informed that the blues, (the republicans) had retired to Aurai and Landevan, two leagues distant. The troops continued in this situation to the second of July. Bodies of men dressed as peasants daily came in to see the army, and professing to partake of their triumphal landing; to these arms were distributed, and other necessaries, without discrimination of age or ſex, even the women were furniſhed. In this way more than 28,000 muſkets were diſpoſed of. Some detachments of grenadiers and Chouans had been detached to Landevan and Mindon to cut off the communication with L'Orient and Vannes. Here it was that the Chouans began to ſhew how little dependance there could be placed on them; for a corps of between two and three thouſand no ſooner ſaw a body of three hundred republicans than they threw down their arms and fled. Another body of theſe royaliſts took poſſeſſion of Aurai, but upon ſight of a few of the blue uniforms with two pieces of cannon, fled without firing a ſingle ſhot.

Puiſſaye all this time talked of reſources and ſuccour on the ſide of Rennes, and of throwing himſelf into that town. At any event it was of the firſt importance to poſſeſs a poſt which would enable the Engliſh to land all their future ſuccours and reinforcements promiſed by the Engliſh miniſtry. The peninſula of Quiberon, which forms the bay and which was itſelf defended by a formidable fortreſs, offered theſe advantages. It was protected at Saint Barbe, at fort Penthievre, by a tongue of land three leagues in length, half a mile in breadth at the wideſt part, and terminated under the cannon of the fort by a ſpace of about half a mile, which afforded no ſhelter whatever, and rendered its approach very difficult. This fort called by the republicans Sansculotte, Puiſſaye determined to attack on the evening of the 2d of July. Puiſſaye was to lead a corps of emigrants, Chouans, and Engliſh, from the ſhips on the point of the peninſula, while the ſhips of war ſhould cannonade the fort, at the ſame time d'Hervilly was to ſcale St. Barbe. The troops had commenced their march at duſk of the evening, but at day-break Puiſſaye ordered them to return, as the ſhips were not able to co-operate owing to a change of the wind. D'Hervilly however, was not unſucceſsful, for the fort of St. Barbe was ſurrendered to him without a ſhot being fired. It appeared however, that there was neither proviſion nor ammunition in the place, and for ſeveral days the garriſon of ſix hundred men had been reduced to a biſcuit per day. This ſucceſs was ſomewhat alleviating of the failure of the main attack. On the 3d and 4th the Chouans in the villages of Landevan, Mindon, and Aurai, and ſeveral of the emigrant poſts, were attacked by the republicans, who were obliged to abandon their poſition. The republicans appear to have had the moſt perfect intelligence of the emigrants diſpoſitions and movements.

The whole of the period from the firſt landing had been occupied by the ſhips of war and tranſports in removing the immenſe ſtores and proviſions from the ſhips; great diſorder took place among the Engliſh ſailors, and the Engliſh commiſſaries acted with a degree of inſolence and folly that cauſed general but ineffectual complaints. It was however determined that the whole of the troops hitherto cantoned, ſhould now remove within the peninſula and fort of Quiberon; but here a new blunder was diſcovered, no camp-equipage had been provided amidſt the vaſt abundance of preparation and expenditure. However in a council on the 5th it was reſolved to remove thither and make uſe of the beſt means that the exigency could provide; it was neceſſary to prevent diſorder, and to promote diſcipline. Monſieur Vauban with a few emigrants and Chouans were left in Carnac and other villages. As ſoon as the emigrants were quietly poſted within the peninſula, the republicans attacked Carnac and all the other out poſts. A part of the emigrants ſaved themſelves on board the Engliſh boats, the reſt were purſued under the cannon of the fort. To repair this diſaſter a ſally was concerted from the fort and executed on the morning of the 7th; but the emigrants were repulſed with conſiderable loſs. From thence to the 15th the republicans were indefatigably employed in conſtructing works on the heights of St. Barbe. The moſt ſkilful of the emigrants were ſatisfied that a retreat was now expedient. But the moſt fatal blindneſs governed their leaders. Diſorder had increaſed inſtead of being cured by the removal of the troops within the peninſula. In theſe circumſtances another ſortie was determined upon.

The emigrants, Chouans, and Engliſh now within the peninſula amounted to upwards of 12,000, of theſe 5000 were ſelected for this ſervice. On the night of the fifteenth this detachment marched to attack the republican entrenchments on the heights of St. Barbe. Preparations were not wanting for their reception. They had apparently entrenched themſelves in three diſtinct camps. Their force amounting to ſix thouſand men; Vauban with a body of Engliſh and two thouſand Chouans was to make a diverſion at the point where they landed on the twenty-ſeventh of June, and to march directly and poſſeſs fort St. Michel, thence to continue his route ſo that he ſhould take the batteries of St. Barbe in the rear; the main body was at the ſame time to attack the republicans by Falaiſe. Vauban was to make ſignals by firing one rocket when he diſembarked, two on marching forward, and if obliged to re-embark to fire three rockets. The two firſt ſignals were regularly made, but upon the firſt ſhot being fired the Chouans ran to diſembark, ſwearing they could go no further and according made their way to Quiberon. The main body was of neceſſity ignorant of this circumſtance, as the three rockets were not fired.

A little before day-break the advanced guard of the royaliſts attacked the out-poſts of the republicans. They ſtormed their firſt camp; and the republicans retreated in their cuſtomary way, ſharp ſhooting; the ſecond camp was likewiſe attacked and carried in the ſame manner. No noiſe being heard in the rear it was evident that Vauban's enterpriſe did not ſucceed, and it was propoſed to ſack the two camps and retire. This advice was given by Rotalier commandant of the artillery and Langlet an experienced officer; Sombreuil alſo who had arrived only two days before with reinforcements, gave the ſame advice, and d'Hervilly who commanded, appeared diſpoſed to follow the advice, when an appearance of diſorder in the republican ranks induced him to take advantage of it, and inſtantly to order the charge. The diſorder was only a ſtratagem. But fluſhed with their firſt ſucceſs the emigrants ruſhed on to the attack of the third camp, when an immenſe maſked battery was opened in front and poured out vollies of grape ſhot upon them. The carnage was dreadful. The courage of the officers was inſufficient to keep the men in their ranks, half of which were already proſtrate on the earth, and continued to be mowed down; they diſperſed, threw down their arms, and even threw off their clothes and ſhoes to fly more ſpeedily. D'Hervilly ſeeing the diſorder of the columns on the right, had ſcarcely given the word of command of "half round to the right," when he received a ſhot which paſſed through his body, and put him out of action, he was carried on board a frigate. No ſecond had been provided. Diſorder become general, the republican cavalry charged; five pieces of the royaliſt cannon were turned upon them in their flight. To add to the ſad condition of the fugitives, the Engliſh ſhips fired broadſides on them and the republicans who purſued them. The deluded emigrants harraſſed and diſmayed, reduced to half their number entered the peninſula complaining that they had been led to butchery.

Among the circumſtances which contributed to the failure of this diſaſtrous expedition, may be reckoned the baſe intrigues of the Engliſh miniſters. Habituated to general corruption, and as it is the vital principle of the government, it ſuperinduces an extenſion of the practice to every object. In recruiting for the emigrant corps they had employed agents to viſit the priſons in which the French priſoners were confined, and by proffers of money, promiſes of promotion, and even threats of cloſer confinement, induced many hundreds to accept their offers; for it was not unſeen by the republican priſoner, that the means of treachery employed againſt his country might be made uſe of to regain his liberty, and accordingly the ſentiment ſoon became very general, and the republican priſoners who had accepted the proffered bounty returned to adviſe their countrymen in priſon of the means that offered to return to their country, but were generally treated by the generous but miſtaken republicans as traitors for even taking advantage of ſuch proffers. Theſe men however on their arrival at Quiberon ſerved the republic, more effectually than they could in priſon. They obtained information of every particular of the expedition, and by gradual deſertion communicated to the republicans the moſt minute details of the emigrant operations. Between the 16th and 20th near a hundred and fifty men had deſerted from a ſingle regiment. Hoche who commanded the republicans loſt no opportunity of improving upon their information, and the diſaſter that took place in the action was the moſt effectual. Puiſſaye during all this time lived in a ſtate of Aſiatic luxury, ſuch as he had witneſſed in his communications with his Engliſh employers; he had carried his effeminacy to ſuch extravagance and blind exceſs, that while the moſt vigilant meaſures were going on in camp to defend themſelves againſt the republicans, he had employed a great number of men in deranging a whole magazine to find under the packages a net to catch fiſh for his table; relying upon what he called his fortunate ſtar, he did not give himſelf the fatigue of even viſiting the poſts; but diſtributed croſſes of St. Louis, honorary medals, brevets, to officers and ſoldiers who diſtinguiſhed themſelves on the 16th. He cauſed to be given out in general orders the news of ſix advantages obtained over the republicans by the Chouans under M. de Tintiniac, and became the jeſt of even his own ſoldiers for his rhodomantades.

The troops compoſing Sombreuil's diviſion lately arrived, was not diſembarked until the ſeventeenth of July. It conſiſted of the regiments of Rohan, Salm, Dumas, Behon, and Perigord. On the evening of the eighteenth Puiſſaye ſurrounded by a number of his officers on horſeback, was approached by a number of republican officers alſo on horſeback. Both parties were deſirous of a parley, though the republicans at firſt pretended to avoid it:—However they approached—the republicans began the converſation by compaſſionating the fate of the emigrant priſoners they had taken, "all we deſire," ſaid they, "is, that you treat our wounded as well as we do yours; we have torn our ſhirts to "dreſs them.—You have loſt a worthy officer in M. Telonet, we regret him as a brave "man." At length by various obſervations that neceſſarily called forth replies, the republicans diſcovered that the information obtained from deſerters exactly correſponded with what they now learned. "Do you really believe" ſaid a republican officer to the marquis de Contades, "that with the few troops you have you can conquer us, when "200,000 bayonets could not ſucceed in the attempt."—"It is not with bayonets," replied he, "we hope to ſucceed, but by the force of opinion whoſe power you know "ſo well. We have with us millions of money, and proviſions to maintain an army of "20,000 men for ſix months. Very well, we will ſay even to yourſelves, come and "ſhare with us, like brothers. It is thus we will combat you, and we doubt not, but " the good Frenchmen, who are rather miſled than criminal, will ſoon unite with us." It was propoſed to ſhake hands; the republican officer refuſed— "Not to-day," ſaid he, "we ſhall meet again;— but you ſhould write to Tallien, he is at L'Orient; you "ſhould come to an underſtanding." They parted; the emigrants were delighted with their republican opponents; who were no leſs pleaſed at the information which they had obtained.

The night of the twentieth was calculated for deeds of horror; a moſt violent weſt wind, a pelting rain prevailed; it was one of thoſe ſeaſons which favours ſurpriſes, and demands from the warrior double vigilance againſt attack; far from taking ſuch meaſures the ordinary precautions ſeem to have been neglected. M. de Falmont of the engineers, with two of the newly arrived regiments and another half battallion were on duty: but the troops were more occupied in ſeeking ſhelter from the pitileſs ſtorm, than guarding againſt an aſſault. Patroles had been obſerved by ſome officers of the guard, and in great numbers; but they were clothed in red, and had given the watch-word of the night correctly. Theſe patroles were the republicans dreſſed in the Engliſh uniform, and conducted by deſerters, perfectly acquainted with the ſtate of the fort, and of all the poſts; they had paſſed along in ſingle file, on the low level ſhore at low water, and climbing up the rocks had already reached the platform, which, a thing unheard of in military affairs, had not one centinel on duty there. Some artillery men without fire were aſleep in the guard-houſe; one of the officers hearing the footſteps ſtarted up, and ran to fire the alarm, which was to be three guns, he fired only two, when his matches were extinguiſhed, and the lanthorn which was to be hoiſted as another ſignal to the ſhips, was put out, ſo that ignorant of what was paſſing on ſhore, no movement was made by the fleet.

The ſame uncertainty prevailed in the camp, but the generale was inſtantly beat in the cantonments. Meanwhile confuſion prevailed in the poſt of the platform; moved partly by promiſes, partly by threats, but more eſpecially by rebukes for attacks upon their country at the inſtigation of her bittereſt enemy, conſiderable numbers of the emigrants grounded their arms and joined in the cry of vive la republique! Meantime the ſecond battalion of Royal-Louis, which was the neareſt in the village, under its colonel D'Atilly arrived. The commandant of the main fort aſtoniſhed at the balls from the platform falling into the entrenchment, thought it owing to ſome miſtake, and went on the glacis of the platform, cried out to the troops vive la roi!— and received three balls in his body.

The republican columns meanwhile were advancing along the beach, or rather in the ſea. Their left column waded up to their necks in the water, moving in that direction with a view to turn the fort entirely on the right, when a battery of three guns well ſerved threw this column into diſorder, and forced it to abandon its object, to croſs the beach and join the right column. They continued to advance, and made themſelves maſters of the entrenchments, chaſing the troops before them as they came up; one party capitulated, and laid down their arms; another covered their retreat by a conſtant fire; while the Chouans ſome wounded, and the officers whoſe ſoldiers had ſubmitmitted, embarked in the boats found near the ſhore, and with much difficulty gained the Engliſh ſhips.

The column on the right and the column in front meanwhile advanced with coolneſs and celerity, and having been joined by the left column that had been thrown into diſor-der, the emigrants were attacked in their centre by a fire from right and left. The corps under Soubreuil was attacked by a felect corps of feven hundred grenadiers under Hoche in perfon, and they laid down their arms. It was aflerted that the emigrants had no ammunition ; in one of thefe conflicts however, Hoche in a public letter fays, "doubtlefs the republicans were ferved with cartridges ; but it is alfo true that not one of them was fired ; for our grenadiers cartridges were fo much damaged by the rain that they were obliged to throw them away, and make ufe of thofe of the emigrants which were left in their cartridge boxes flung away on the rock of Portflingen, at the foot of which feven hundred of them were drowned"

De Retalier, Contades, and Dumas endeavoured to ftop the flight and rally the fugitives, but they were driven into the fea ; the two former efcaped by fwimming their horfes to the boats ; Dumas and the adjutant-general Langlet periflied in the attempt. Sombreuil, whofe diviflon was cantoned at the greateft diftance could take no pofition but that of a mill before St. Julian at the bottom of the peninfula. He made a ftand there for a few moments, and then retired into the fort, where he was compelled to furrender on the verge of the rock. The Engliflh fhips firing on them all the while. He advanced to the republican commander (Hoche) faying—"I afk nothing for myfelf; I furrender ; "do with me as you pleafe ; I only afk their lives for the brave men I command, who as "well as myfelf are the victims of perfidy and cowardice." This brave young gentleman in a letter to the Engliflh admiral fays—"M. Puiffaye having ordered me to take a pofition in which I was to wait his orders, took the fingular precaution of haftening on board a boat which he fecured for his retreat!" This bafe and contemptible man entrufted with the command of above ten thoufand men, had actually embarked at four o'clock in the morning, and employed himfelf in difcovering the number who had efcaped. Of 5000 troops of the line, only about five hundred were fo fortunate as to efcape capture or flaughter. The Chouans exceeding twice that number, including women and children, efcaped in about the fame proportion.

An Engliflh officer who was prefent writes concerning the action—"Though I have feen much active fervice, yet I never beheld fuch a fcene as the field of battle during the conteft, which laflted upwards of fixteen hours ; what with the groans of the dying, the cries of the wounded, the fhouts of the republicans during the whole time, together with their revolutionary tunes, performed by extenfive bands of mufic, which refounded through the air, and in a manner ftunned our very ears!—I even now fhudder at the idea of the picture they prefented when their line was firft broken, which was quickly after the firft attack. The regiment of d'Hervilly, raifed wholly from among the prifoners of war, inftantly joined the republicans in a body, after putting their officers to death ; no ftand was then made, and the poor fellows were knocked on the head one after another, as the enemy would fhew no quarter. Thofe who efcaped from the bayonet were few indeed, and thofe who did were indebted only to their heels which enabled them to efcape to the water, and there, melancholy to fay, many of them found a grave ; only one regiment acted with refolution after the line was broken, they endeavoured to cover the retreat, but their bravery coft them dear as they were nearly all cut off by the bayonet."

The whole of the republican force on this occafion is ftated at no more than three thoufand ; when Sombreuil was taken prifoner and informed of this difparity of numbers, he clapped his hand to his forehead and exclaimed—"ah, I fufpected it!" The writer who relates this fact says, the emigrants conscious of the fate that awaited them, poured forth bitter imprecations of indignation against those by whom they were sent thither, and appeared to repine in their last moments at becoming the blind instruments of a power which in its hatred of France, obtained a triumph, in the destruction of Frenchmen, whichever party was successful.

The unfortunate Sombreuil, the bishop of Dol, who had been sent from England to preach up bloodshed with his brother the grand vicar, Charles Broglio son of the general and several other leaders of the traitor hirelings, to the amount of a hundred and eighty-eight were put to an interrogatory, in which every latitude was allowed them for defence or concession; these were all shot in the course of four days; many of them died crying vive le roi; others of them shewed marks of great pusilanimity; and this is not to be wondered at, if it is considered that according to a report made to the convention on the 27th of July, by the deputy who had been on duty at Quiberon, that the emigrants were armed with poniards, the points of which were poisoned; the experiment was made on an animal, which died of convulsions from the wound!

The republican generals who aided the intrepid young general were, Humbert, Drui, Valeteau, Lemoine, Botta (whose left foot was shot off) and the adjutant general Menage. The effects of this victory were not confined to the destruction of the emigrants, and the fatal example it held forth to them. The blow was as fatal to England, if it is only considered, that at the period when this expedition was equipped a general scarcity of provisions prevailed in England, and that the money and stores, and grain landed in France, fell all into the hands of the republicans. The profusion of arms and ammunition distributed has been already noticed. The national commissioner in writing to the convention on the subject of the capture says—"I have spent this whole day in traversing the peninsula, which contains an enormous quantity of warlike stores of every description. The provisions that have been abandoned by the enemy will be sufficient for the supply of the captors for six months. Arms, clothes, accoutrements, harness, and camp-equipage, are too numerous to specify in an inventory. There appears to be enough of the above to equip an army of 40,000 men!—with a proportionate number for artillery and cavalry!—Wine, oil, rum, vinegar, brandy, rice, salted meat, dried fish, soap, tobacco, sugar, tea, coffee, and biscuit, are in such abundance, that unless they are removed to the interior, they will not only be injured but our soldiers are in danger of being enervated by luxury. We have got possession of several vessels laden with corn and rice." Another officer writes "The commissioners of war, and all the agents of government on the spot, are busied in making inventories of the captured stores and provisions, which are so numerous and detached, that their task cannot be accomplished in less that a fortnight; indeed if they were collected in one magazine, I doubt exceedingly whether four thousand carriages would be sufficient to remove the provisions alone to a moderate distance in the course of a month! A rough estimate has been made of their value, which exceeds 800,000,000! We have among other things whole casks of forged assignats, fabricated with so much art that a common observer could not easily distinguish the false one. Our grenadiers amuse themselves with making bonfires of them." "Their amount in nominal value was ten thousand millions," says another account. "Quiberon peninsula resembles Amsterdam, for the eye is feasted with the sight of immense quantities of grain, sugar, coffee, soap, clothes, ammunition, stores, arms, wine, brandy, rum, &c. in the midſt of this abundance the republicans have not committed one exceſs." —Hoche writes that there were 70,000 muſkets, 150,000 pair of ſhoes, 20,000 hogſheads of wine, rum, brandy, &c. The priſoners taken were ſtated at one hundred and ſeventy eight emigrant officers, privates two hundred and ſixty, inhabitants of Toulon four hundred and ninety two, Chouans three thouſand ſix hundred,—total 6262. The emigrant chiefs only were tried and executed as traitors, the arms ſcattered through the country were called in, and the unfortunate and deluded inhabitants were treated with the utmoſt lenity, and their wounded taken as much care of as the republicans.

This expedition it will be ſeen was connected with the interior inſurrection in the departments, and the conſpiracies at Paris, already noticed. The ſpecious ſuppreſſion of revolt in Vendée, was now once more raiſed into a flame. Charette about this time publiſhed a diſgraceful manifeſto, in which he attempted to apologiſe for his new perfidy, charging the breach of the treaty on the convention, who, he affirmed, had agreed by a ſecret article to reſtore the monarchy in Louis XVII. and accuſing them of having poiſoned that prince to evade the execution of the engagement. It will hardly be credited, after the miſerable cataſtrophe at Quiberon, that infanity or blind animoſity could be carried further by the Engliſh miniſter; but a deſcent was actually meditated on the coaſt of ancient Brittany, with a view of co-operating with the Chouans. The Engliſh fleet with the tranſports and troops on board was kept hovering off the coaſt. In Quiberon bay a council was held, upon the ſubject of an attack on Noirmoutier, which had been formerly in the poſſeſſion of the revolters. The Engliſh commander Warren was the only man in the council who thought the enterprize practicable. It was attacked, and after burning a windmill, the aſſailants were ſo warmly received by a force of 15,000 men and one hundred and twenty pieces of cannon, that they fled with the utmoſt precipitation. The Engliſh then took poſſeſſion of the ſmall iſland of Dieu, where they hoped to eſtabliſh themſelves. It proved however of no uſe but to graze their horſes, and in the month of December they were obliged to evacuate this miſerable ſtation, and their more fatal than viſionary projects. They had ſummoned Belleiſle in the courſe of the expedition but were treated with the utmoſt contempt.

The armies of the republic on the Rhine were not inactive. The important fortreſs of Luxembourg, which had been in a ſtate of blockade, from the period in which the armies of France made themſelves maſters of the circumjacent country, ſurrendered on the ſeventh of June by capitulation. This fortreſs is one of the firſt in Europe, and juſtly eſteemed one of the ſtrongeſt. The garriſon conſiſted of 10,000 men, commanded by the celebrated mareſchal Bender. The poſſeſſion of this place gave the French the command of the whole left of the Rhine excepting Mentz, which had been blockaded for ſome months, and was more eaſily maintained by the Auſtrians, as the communication with Caſſel on the oppoſite ſide of the Rhine was uninterrupted. The paſſage of the river therefore was neceſſary to put the fortreſs into their hands. This enterpriſe was not undertaken until Auguſt, when the veterans had repoſed, and new diviſions joined them to partake of the glory of the campaign. Jourdan commenced his operations with the army of the Sambre and Meuſe, by taking Duſſeldorf, which ſurrendered to him, and left the paſſage of the river wholly at his command. The Auſtrians retreated and joined another corps poſted on the Lhan, between Naſſau and Nieſburg —It was while the army of Jourdan was preſſing on the Auſtrian forces to the north of Mentz, that the army of the Rhine and Moſelle effected the paſſage of the river oppoſite Manheim, of which they immediately took poſſeſſion, as was before noticed. The acquiſition of this place was of great importance to the French, as it cut off the communication between the right and left diviſions of the Auſtrian army. Jourdan purſued his ſucceſs and attacked the Auſtrians on the Lhan, croſſed the Mein, and completed the inveſtment of Mentz.

The Auſtrian army had ample time to retrieve its depreſſion, to recover the troops from their fatigues, and to obtain reinforcements; but ſuch was the terror of the French arms, that no obſtacles appeared likely to be inſurmountable to them. The Auſtrians were retiring ſpiritleſs and dejected, when a ſudden change was wrought in their favour, which totally altered the diſheartening aſpect of the campaign, and turned the fate of war on their ſide for a time.

Subſequent events have thrown light on the myſterious cauſes of this reverſe of fortune. The ſucceſſes of the winter campaign achieved in oppoſition to the opinion and advice of Pichegru; the glories acquired by Jourdan at Fleurus, and the ſeparation of the armies in ſuch a manner as to give Jourdan the poſt of honor and enterpriſe, were ſubjects of ſevere mortification to Pichegru. The beſt underſtanding did not ſubſiſt between theſe generals, and a cordial co-operation could not therefore be expected, where the love of country could not prevail over perſonal envy, and private vanity. There is ſome reaſon to believe, that a correſpondence which was diſcovered to be carried on, at a later period than the preſent, between Pichegru, the emigrants, and Wurmſer, had commenced before this time. There is no other way to account for the conduct of Pichegru on this occaſion, unleſs by ſuppoſing him ignorant of military affairs which has not been ſurmiſed. A diviſion of his army had orders to take poſſeſſion of a poſt in order to prevent the junction of Clairfait's army with Wurmſur's; the latter had ſucceeded Cobourg, and was marching to the relief of Manheim, ſuppoſing that he ſhould arrive in ſufficient time to prevent the ſurrender of that place. The poſt was taken without difficulty as the Auſtrians retreated upon the approach of the aſſailants; a part of the French cavalry, however, having proceeded to pillage, the Auſtrians ſuddenly returned and ſurpriſed them; the French infantry for ſome time ſtood the ſhock, but they were ordered to retreat, and returned to Manheim, rendering all the advantages of the expedition fruitleſs, and leaving the communication open between the two Auſtrian armies.

Previous to this affair, Jourdan had deſired reinforcements, and Pichegru inſtead of ſending them, applied to the government, repreſenting the armies as inſufficient to perform the ſervices for which they were deſtined. The objects of Jourdan's army were to carry the war into the German empire, and relieve the left bank of the Rhine from its preſſure; Pichegru's duty was to keep the Auſtrians in check, while the ſiege of Mentz was carried on by a diſtinct body. The forces under Pichegru were more than competent to theſe ends, but the retreat of his corps to Manheim, left Jourdan no alternative between being cut off from all communication with France or a retreat. He determined on the latter. In the mean time a diviſion of the Auſtrians ſuddenly violating the neutral territory between the Lhan and Mein, had fallen on his rear, and took a conſiderable part of his artillery by ſurprize. This violation of the neutral territory was made not only in contempt of treaties, but with the knowledge and conſent of Pruſſian officers. Prince Hohenloe had, at the commencement of the Pruſſian negociation with France, concurred in ſentiments with the Auſtrian generals, and was equally anxious to break off the negociations; it was for this purpoſe that he attacked Kaiſerſlautern by ſurpriſe, where 2,000 of the French were killed and the place taken. The Pruſſian court, however, made immediate conceſſions for this breach of faith, and the negociation was ſoon after renewed. This prince was at Frankfort, when the French paſſed the Rhine; and he it was, who encouraged Clairfait to the violation of the neutral territory and attack on Jourdan, by repreſenting the ſtate of the French poſition, and that the French general placed every reliance on the ſecurity of the neutral territory in his rear. Jourdan therefore ordered the ſiege of Mentz to be raiſed, and began his retreat acroſs the Mein. Clairfait having aſſembled various detachments on the Necker, purſued Jourdan. Pichegru who had remained inactive for ſome time, now croſſed the Rhine at Manheim, with a view to ſend the reinforcement, which Jourdan had fought before he was obliged to retreat. A ſtrong garriſon was left in Manheim. After various ſkirmiſhes Jourdan effected a very able retreat to Duſſeldorf, where he had originally paſſed the Rhine; but the garriſon of Mentz having been ſtrongly reinforced, two Auſtrian diviſions croſſed the river at different points, and attacked the remainder of the French who had been intrenched before that place, and drove them after an obſtinate reſiſtance from all their poſts, deſtroyed their works, and took their artillery.

The Auſtrians having relinquiſhed the purſuit of Jourdan, leaving ſufficient forces on the Sieg, a river on the right ſide of the Rhine, which empties itſelf into that river oppoſite to Bonn, directed the greater part of their forces towards the palatinate. They had gained poſſeſſion of that country as far as from Landau to the banks of the Moſelle, when Jourdan, aſſembling all the troops along the left ſide of the Rhine, and leaving a conſiderable force in Duſſeldorf, advanced and prevented their further progreſs in that quarter.

Terror now ſpread as far as Luxembourg, the inhabitants of which were ordered as a meaſure of precaution to proviſion themſelves for twelve months. The movements of Jourdan diſpelled their apprehenſions and checked the Auſtrian incurſions. The town of Manheim had been well garriſoned, but was beſieged with great vigor. This beautiful city, which the French had ſpared, fell a prey to the flames, the Auſtrians bombarding it with violence in revenge for the quiet and amicable ſurrender of the place to the French. The garriſon cut off from ſupplies were compelled to capitulate to the amount of 8,000 men. The Palatinate now became the theatre of war. All that part of the country which lies within the lines drawn from the Rhine between Landau and Deux-ponts, and from thence to the country lying along the Moſelle as far as Treves, was occupied by the Auſtrians. The French attacked them with great impetuoſity in order to regain their honor and the ground they had loſt; but each ſtep was vigorouſly diſputed. They, however, ſucceeded ſo far as to reduce the boundary of the Auſtrian victories within narrower limits; and the campaign was concluded by common conſent of the hoſtile generals, who agreed to a ſuſpenſion of arms for three months, which was ratified by the reſpective powers.

Thus finiſhed a campaign which in this quarter had been altogether unfortunate for the French: The army of Italy had continued for the moſt part on the defenſive, having to contend with ſuperior forces. That of the Pyrenees, after peace was concluded with Spain, had been too much harraſſed to be employed immediately on diſtant ſervice. The reverſe on the Rhine have been attributed with great ingenuity to many cauſes, the ſtate of parties and the fluctuation of opinions in the executive committees muſt have contributed to render the jarring of the generals more fatal, ſince parties were ſo moderate and ſo exactly balanced as to power and meaſures, that while energy was loſt, the ſeveral generals were ſupported even in their errors. Had the French on the Lhan been ſupported duly, the terror that their arms had inſpired would have been a potent auxiliary, and the Auſtrians muſt have relinquiſhed the Rhine for the defence of the empire; ſucceſs would have crowned their efforts. Jourdan and Pichegru had been deſired by the committees to anſwer a ſeries of queſtions which were ſent them prior to the paſſage of the Rhine, in order to determine the government what meaſures it ought to purſue in an enterprize of ſuch importance; the anſwers of Jourdan were deemed moſt ſatisfactory and enterprizing, the calculations were more clear and bold and the reſults the moſt important. The great error of the committees lay in not entruſting him with ſuch general command as would enable him to combine and ſecure all his operations. A principal object was not executed, the whole plan which reſted upon that was neceſſarily deſtroyed.

The queſtion was alſo agitated whether the reſpectable ſituation of the republic with full poſſeſſion of all the left of the Rhine except Mentz, Holland detached from the enemy, and the Belgic provinces united with France, Pruſſia detached from the coalition and Spain begging for peace; the republican armies every where victorious and the conſtitution about to be eſtabliſhed; if this was not the favorable moment to open negociations for peace for Europe? The deſtruction of the emigrants at Quiberon decided the queſtion in the affirmative. The overture was made, but Auſtria would not negociate alone, and England would not accept any overtures in which the abandonment of Belgium was not a preliminary with other articles. The reverſes of the French on the Rhine ſerved to confirm the Engliſh principles, by buoying up the hopes of Auſtria, and the truce at the concluſion of the campaign, which was acceded to with a common hope of terminating the war by an intermediate negociation, was only employed by England to contract freſh alliances and procure freſh loans for the proſecution of hoſtilities.

An Engliſh writer obſerves, that it is juſtly a matter of ſurprize, conſidering the eminent advantages poſſeſſed by England, and conſidering the diſtreſſed and diſtracted ſtate of France, during the greater part of the war, the ſucceſſes of the former ſhould have been ſo ſmall in the Weſt-Indies. England engaged in the conteſt not ſingle handed with a rival nation, but with a nation divided within itſelf, and aſſailed by all the powers of Europe beſide, France had in combination againſt her five of the moſt powerful monarchies in the world—the whole empire of Germany—the ſtates of Italy—the Dutch ſtadtholderate—principalities and powers too numerous to detail, and the reputed force and reſources of which is almoſt beyond calculation. England poſſeſſed beſide at the commencement of the war an invincible navy, and poſſeſſed in one of her iſlands an almoſt inexhauſtible nurſery of hardy men capable of being converted at will into ſoldiers and ſailors. France, ſoon after the commencement of the war ſaw the remains of her navy deſerted by her principal officers, and delivered by treachery into the hands of her enemy, and partly burned, carried off, or deſtroyed. The finances of England according to the declarations of her own miniſters "uniformly in the moſt flouriſhing ſtate; while thoſe "of France were not on the verge but in the very gulph of ruin." The foreign poſſeſſions of England alſo have been in a ſtate of quiet and proſperity; the colonies of France distracted by dissension, and wasted by the horrors of civil war. Much therefore might have been expected, yet what has been done; a few islands purchased by the meanest artifices of seduction, and rewarded by a perfidious breach of the conditions on which they were surrendered.

On the other hand, the decree for the emancipation of the blacks, could not be expected to produce a sudden effect; that was to be operation of a wide, sensible, and effectual diffusion; the senses of the slave from infancy, can be operated upon only by the release from his pains, and the severities of a state which loses half its horrors by a total inexperience of a more happy condition; his ideas rarely extend to independence and those charms which liberty possesses to the mind habituated to freedom and its blessings. Domestic slavery carries with it something revolting to the least enlightened mind, so as to be capable of exciting the most tumultuous emotions; but it is not the idea but the actual possession for a time which actually conveys a just impression of its value. The wretches who languish under the lash, and dwindle out a miserable existence under every form of oppression—who labour that others may rest, and sow only that others may reap—these, at least could not but be expected to join without hesitation the standard which proclaims their personal independence and a release from their miseries. It was no wonder that at Guadaloupe the infamous Grey should be more rapidly expelled by the energy of those liberated unfortunates, than he acquired possession by slaves of a fairer colour. In concluding the transactions of the West-Indies for the last year, the conquest of Guadaloupe by Victor Hugues was noticed, and the resistance made at fort Matilda; this place stood out still the tenth of December 1794; when the republicans being reinforced by three thousand men, the English were compelled to evacuate the fort and island. The English in their flight however lost only sixteen killed and seventy-five wounded. On the twenty-fifth of the same month the fort of Tiburon in St. Domingo was attacked by three armed vessels from Aux Cayes. Having landed their artillery, they mounted one eighteen pounder, one of nine, two pieces of four, and one of two pounds, and commenced a brisk attack with the usual skill and dexterity of French engineers. They blew up an armed ship by their fire, dismounted and silenced the guns on the lower battery of the fort; and then assaulted the main fort itself, from whence they drove the English on the twenty-ninth with great loss.

The situation of the Dutch island St. Eustatius, as well as the quantity of naval stores which was known to be deposited there; rendered it an object of considerable moment to each of the principal parties in the war. As England had the dominion of the sea, it might have been expected that she would have made early efforts to secure the possession of it. But so much was the English ministry enveloped in the fascinating dream of the conquest of France, at Quiberon, that this important place was left wholly unprotected. In the beginning of April 1795, it was summoned by a single schooner only, with French and Batavian commissioners on board; but the governor refusing to deliver it up, they departed and shortly after returned with a force sufficient for its reduction, and it became a prize to the French republic.

The successes of the English in the outset of their enterprises, and their base conduct to those whom they had seduced to treason against their country, had by two opposite means promoted one end, a general hatred of the English. Their success irritated the republicans, and their breach of faith the royalists; and the blacks were alike enraged, by the cruel ſale of them, after they had been freed under the French decree. Such a combination of cauſes was calculated to produce extraordinary effects. Their European force was very ſmall, but they relied on the ſpirit which the violence of the Engliſh had raiſed, to produce a very general revolt in their favor; therefore inſtead of contending for the recovery of their own loſſes, they meditated no leſs than the entire ſubjection of the betrayed and formerly ceded iſlands. In the beginning of the year perſons well acquainted with the internal ſtate of the ſeveral iſlands, were landed at St. Lucia, St. Vincent's, Grenada and Dominica, as well as at other places where the Engliſh had rule. The French planters and free people of colour in theſe iſlands were already fully informed of the ſtate of political affairs in Europe; they were informed of a general diſpoſition to free the whole Weſt-Indies from the Engliſh yoke, and ſolicited to take up arms in the general cauſe. The negroes were carefully appriſed of the decree for their liberation, and that their fellow-blacks were already free, and enjoyed the ſame rights and privileges as the whites in the French colonies; that thouſands of them were armed, and many of them in command ready to come to the ſuccour of thoſe in bondage, and they were recommended to conſider of the opportunity of ridding themſelves from their cruel taſk-maſters. The blacks were already very generally informed of what had taken place, but could ſcarcely give credit to a change ſo extraordinary and exceeding all their former hopes; theſe aſſurances and incitements were followed by a ſupply of arms, and ſeveral of the moſt intelligent of the ſlaves who were carried to the French colonies, to be free witneſſes of the ſtate of things, returned with a full and ſatisfactory confirmation of the intelligence, and animated by the ſame enthuſiaſm that pervaded the French iſlands. So active and vigilant were they, that in the beginning of March, a general inſurrection of the blacks took place in all thoſe colonies.

In St. Lucia the inſurrection was not from the firſt confined to the blacks. The white inhabitants generally had been all along, impreſſed with a ſympathy in the ſucceſſes of the revolution. The people of colour alſo generally roſe in arms, and the whole iſland except Morne Fortune, and the Carenage, was in a few days in the power of the inſurgents. On the twentieth of April the Engliſh general Stuart, who commanded at St. Lucia, proceeded to attack the principal poſt of the French at Souffriere; but in the courſe of his march he fell into an ambuſcade, wherein after ſuffering immenſely, he was fortunate enough to diſperſe the aſſailants; and purſued his march. On the twenty-ſecond he attacked them at Souffriere, but after a deſparate conflict, he was repulſed with the loſs of 200 men, beſide ſeveral officers. He was compelled to retreat, and to confine himſelf to the fort, until the beginning of July, when the iſland was totally evacuated by the Engliſh.

In Grenada the inſurrection was ſeconded by a ſmall detachment of French troops, diſpatched thither by Victor Hugues from Guadaloupe. The conflicts were frequent and the Engliſh conſtantly repulſed. The iſland, meanwhile, ſuffered all the devaſtation of war and inſurrection: but reinforcements arriving to the Engliſh, the revolters were obliged to take refuge in the heights and faſtneſſes, and a temporaneous tranquillity was reſtored, though the iſland could not be ſaid to be in poſſeſſion of England at the cloſe of this year. To complete the misfortunes of war, the iſland was viſited by that terrible epidemic, the yellow fever, always ſo fatal to the European conſtitution, and immenſe numbers fell victims to its ravages.

At Dominica Victor Hugues was alleged to have concerted the plan of its reduction with the French inhabitants; and a ſmall detachment of troops was alſo ſent thither from Guadaloupe. The Engliſh inhabitants however were numerous, and they embodied with great ſpirit; the inſurrection was in a ſhort time quelled. The ſanguinary proceedings of the Engliſh, however, was a ſad contraſt to their bravery in repelling the inſurrection. Upon the unproved allegation of the French inhabitants having concerted the revolt, numbers of them were put to death in cold blood, ſix hundred and upwards of them were baniſhed and tranſported to England, and their property confiſcated, by the mere act of the governor on ſuſpicion of diſaffection.

In St. Vincent's, the Charibbs, who inhabited the interior hilly parts of the iſland, and who had formerly experienced the moſt barbarous injuſtice and cruelty from the Engliſh, were the principal inſurgents. They reſiſted for a conſiderable time with great bravery and repulſed the Engliſh troops in two ſevere conflicts. As the fate of St. Vincent's appeared to depend principally on that of St. Lucia, the inſurrection could not be ſaid to be completely ſuppreſſed at the concluſion of the year.

In this period of general revolt Jamaica was not exempted from its ſhare of diſaſter. On the fourteenth of June, a dreadful fire broke out at Montego-bay, and conſumed an immenſe quantity of ſtores, and reduced the greater part of the town to aſhes. This was attributed to the diſcontented blacks. But a calamity of a ſtill more ſerious aſpect followed; a war with the Maroons, who inhabit the mountainous diſtricts of the iſland. This ſubject was no where ſo clearly developed as in a debate in the Engliſh Houſe of Commons, by which it appears that the cruelty of the government excited it, and that the barbarity with which it was conducted, can be equalled only by the conduct of the Engliſh in Bengal, and in Ireland, or by the Spaniards in South America. The Maroons were a free people, who, on the ceſſion of the Iſland by the Spaniards refuſed to ſubmit to the Engliſh dominion, and their territory and privileges were both ſecured to them by a moſt ſolemn treaty. The war was ſaid in debate to originate in the following manner, and as there were the whole of the members returned by the Weſt-India intereſt, and the miniſters preſent, and neither of them attempted to contradict the facts, there can be no diſpute upon its accuracy and authenticity. By the treaty between the Engliſh and the Maroons, it was ſtipulated that none of the latter ſhould be puniſhed by the government or inhabitants of Jamaica, for any offence; but if any of them committed a crime or offence, he ſhould be given up to his own nation for trial and puniſhment. One of the Maroons had committed a petty theft; and in direct violation of the treaty, inſtead of being ſent back to his own nation to be tried, he was condemned by the governor of Jamaica to be whipped; a puniſhment conſidered by thoſe children of nature with abhorrence and peculiarly ignominious. The man returned to his nation with the odious marks of the laſh on his back. Redreſs was demanded under the obligations of the treaty, the application was received with that inſolent contempt with which weakneſs has always been treated by the Engliſh. The Maroons were only the more indignant, and regardleſs of the ſtrength of their oppreſſors, conſidered only their injuſtice and the flagrant violation of public faith—they flew to arms, inſtead of conciliatory meaſures, the ſuperior dignity of the Engliſhman over the ſavage made him conſider the very ſhew of reſentment as the laſt of crimes, and a war of extermination was ſolemnly proclaimed againſt them! It was not to be expected that a rude and ſimple, though a hardy and brave people, amounting only to a few hundreds, ſhould be able to maintain their ground againſt the Engliſh force, aided by all the means of art, which give ſo much additional force to the military bodies of civilized nations; they were ſeveral times defeated, but neither vanquiſhed nor diſmayed; their hardihood was inconquerable, and their intrepidity fatal to the Engliſh troops, who could not appear before them but in numerous and compact bodies. An Engliſh officer who had diſtinguiſhed himſelf in the ſanguinary ſchool of the Engliſh army during the American revolution, lord Balcarras, was the commander of the armed force, he applied for and procured a number of blood-hounds from Cuba, to hunt down theſe wretched Indians. Thus the Engliſh revived in the Weſt-Indians the ſyſtem and means of barbarity which they had purſued in Ireland two centuries before, againſt the wild Iriſh, the Maroons of that day; and in the cloſe of the eighteenth eclipſed that conduct of the Spaniards in the ſixteenth, which "damned them to everlaſting fame." —To a nation ſo bereaved of all moral principle, ſo deſtitute of every regard to local obligation, ſo flagrantly indifferent to reputation, to honor, and the received laws of ſociety, exhibited ſo uniformly through the whole progreſs of this unparalleled war, the loſs of colonies and the jealouſy and final execration of mankind are but neceſſary conſequences.

Her diſaſters in the Weſt-Indies, however, were in ſome degree allayed by the ſucceſs of an expedition againſt the ſouthern ſettlements of Africa,—the Dutch colonies at the Cape of Good Hope. This rich promontory ſurpaſſing in healthineſs and temperature of climate, and productiveneſs of ſoil, has for half a century been an object of anxious ſolicitude to the commercial ambition of England: forming as it were the key of the Oriental navigation, and the entrepot of Aſia and Europe. The iſſue of affairs in the winter campaign of 1794 left her at liberty to purſue an object which ſhe had ſo long coveted, and accordingly a ſquadron under admiral Elphinſtone arrived there on the ſixteenth of September. The place fell an eaſy conqueſt.

The early naval operations of this year it has been ſeen, were not ſo advantageous to the Engliſh as might have been expected from the excellency of their ſhips and the exactneſs of their diſcipline. At the cloſe of the year the ſucceſs of the French was conſiderable whether conſidered in a naval or a pecuniary view. On the ſeventh of October the Engliſh Mediterranean fleet of merchantmen, conſiſting of upwards of ſixty ſail, richly laden, homeward bound, and convoyed by three ſhips of the line and four frigates, were overtaken off Cape St. Vincent by the French ſquadron under Richery, which had ſailed from Toulon for the purpoſe. On deſcrying the French fleet the Engliſh commodore made the ſignal to wear and ſtand from them. The French frigates, however, were diſpatched to intercept the merchantmen; the Engliſh ſhips of war preſſed all their ſail and the whole fleet took various directions. The Engliſh ſhips of war were the Formidable, Bedford, and Cenſeur; the latter was cut off by the French and captured; the other two eſcaped; but thirty-three of the merchantmen were inſtantly captured, and about twenty more in the chace. Richery's fleet conſiſting of nine ſhips of the line beſide his frigates. He carried his prizes including the Cenſeur into Cadiz.

About the ſame period eighteen ſail of homeward bound Jamaica ſhips were taken by the French ſquadron from Rochefort. The whole loſs of the Engliſh in veſſels captured down to the cloſe of this year amounted to upward of 3000, thoſe captured from the French did not exceed 800!

Such was the close of the transactions of this momentous year. To look back only to that period, when in the blindness of arrogance the English ministers compelled the French minister Chauvelin to leave England; to consider the moderation, the almost unexampled humility of France, in sending Talleyrand with Chauvelin, and with a letter in the hand-writing of the unfortunate Louis the XVI. addressed to the English king, beseeching him to act the part of umpire and mediator, not to interfere hostilely, but to compose by his influence the differences between France and the empire; to consider France even after these fruitless efforts authorising Chauvelin, and dispatching Maret expressly for the purpose of offering to England her choice of the French colonies in the East or West-Indies as the price of peace—Maret, who was to be subsequently the minister appointed to receive the humble supplications of England for peace, ordered contemptuously to depart and told that England had already colonies enough and wished not to be burdened with more!—And who will not deplore the blindness of ambition.

The suspension of arms was not productive of the peace that had been expected, the treasures of England were not yet exhausted, and the reverses of the last campaign, with the secret schemes of corruption which were during the armistice carried on with double diligence by the allies, promised them in the approaching campaign a prospect which could not be in their minds realized by any treaty with the rulers of France. Meanwhile the French directory having consolidated the powers of their government, and set it in motion; their first plans for the approaching campaign were laid with an address and design that rivalled or surpassed the great combinations formed by the committees of the convention.

A. D. 1796.] The preparations of both parties were stupendous; each had collected vast magazines, and augmented their forces; and notwithstanding France had still to contend with the insurrection in Vendée and the Western departments, her measures for extending the operations of war across the Alps were neither abated nor impeded; the republican army of Italy which possessed only a few posts on the shores of the Mediterranean, between Nice and Genoa, had been considerably recruited, and bent its attention to the complete conquest of Piedmont, so soon as the armistice should be concluded.

The civil war which had proved more injurious to the republic, than even the efforts of all Europe, was now drawing to a close. The vigor and decision displayed in annihilating the invaders at Quiberon, was calculated to produce a powerful impression on Charette, Stofflet, and those other chiefs, who, after being admitted to treat with the government as with a foreign power, had again seduced the inhabitants from peace and allegiance. It was necessary to quell this insurrection before the campaign opened, at once to quiet the nation and to leave its forces at liberty to act against the external enemy. The directory with great propriety selected the conqueror of Quiberon for this service; and Hoche proved himself here as well as on the former occasion possessed of the courage and talents necessary to accomplish an enterprize so critical.

Stofflet, had issued proclamations wherein he signified to the insurgents, that the pacification which had been entered into was only to procure means to carry on the revolt with more effect, and asserting that the republic was actuated only by a desire to quiet them, and to cut them off individually in the moments of peace. The revolt, however, was not so general, though it was more ferocious and destructive than before; indiscriminate pluuder and maſſacre marked their ſteps, and to excite their vengeance it was crime enough to covet peace.

The conflict however was of ſhorter duration, after ſeveral defeats of the various rebel armies, the faithleſs leaders Charette and Stofflet were taken on the twenty-ninth of March, and put to death; ſoon after the remainder of the inſurgents comprehended under the names of the armies of the Sun and of Jeſus, Chouans, and Vendeans, harraſſed on every ſide, ſubmitted to the forces of the republic, and peace was finally reſtored to thoſe beautiful but deſolated departments.

In the ſouth the campaign opened on the ninth of April. During the former campaigns the mountains of Piedmont ſeemed to oppoſe an inſurmountable barrier to their progreſs. The van-guard of the Alps only had been ſcaled, and the proſpect before them with the prejudices of ages preſented a perſpective of difficulties which ſeemed inſurmountable to men not actuated by the genius that now animated France. The coaſt from Nice to Genoa had preſented few military obſtacles, but the grand deſigns of France extended to the conqueſt and regeneration of Italy. The poſſeſſions of the emperor in that enſlaved region preſented an object upon which the arms of France could at once ſtrike a deciſive blow on their immediate enemy, and extend her own ſtrength and glory by reviving in the minds of the Italians the remembrance and reſtoring to them the poſſeſſion of liberty. But the paſſage was blockaded by the Auſtrian and Sardinian armies, who had apparently taken the moſt effectual meaſures to prevent the further progreſs of the republican legions.

But the army of Italy was entruſted to a youthful officer, who had not yet led an army, but who had given ſuch indications of genuis and heroiſm at Toulon and elſewhere, as to promiſe from him the moſt glorious ſucceſſes. The firſt action of the preſent campaign took place near Savona, on the ſhores of the Mediterranean. The French occupied a poſt near Voltri, ſix leagues from Genoa. Beaulieu attacked a diviſion of the French and drove them back to their lines near Savona, where preſuming on his firſt ſucceſs he hoped to cut off that diviſion. Buonaparte who had foreſeen this retreat, had ſtrengthened his poſts on the flanks of the Auſtrians. The poſt of Monte-Notte, lying between Voltri and Savona, had kept the Auſtrians in check, and it was neceſſary to the deſign of Beaulieu that he ſhould take this poſt before he could cut off the retreating diviſion; this he loſt no time in executing. Buonaparte ſeeing that it would be a part of the Auſtrian general's project to attack him with his whole force, detached general Maſſena with his diviſion in the night, to gain the Auſtrian rear. Beautieu as had been foreſeen, having reinforced his army, began the attack at break of day. The action became general and ſevere, and the ſucceſs was uncertain for ſome hours, when the diviſion of Maſſena appeared on the left and rear of the Auſtrians. Unable to withſtand the ſhock, the enemy was thrown into confuſion, completely routed, and purſued by the republicans to Cairo. The enemy loſt 3,000 men killed and 2,000 taken priſoners.

Buonaparte improving upon his victory puſhed forward and took poſſeſſion of Cairo. This poſt is on the river Bormida, and commands the roads leading into Turin and Lombardy. The Auſtrians retreating along the mountains to the left of this river, halted at Milleſſimo, the defiles leading to which were immediately forced by general Angereau on the eleventh of April, who ſurrounded a diviſion of 1500 grenadiers, commanded by the Auſtrian general Provera; but this officer threw himſelf into the ruins of an old caſtle on the ſummit of Mount Caſſaria, where he formed entrenchments. After a ſevere cannonade a general attack was made in four columns on this poſt, in which the French were repulſed with the loſs of two generals who commanded in the aſſault. Provera keeping firm in his poſition, ſtopped the progreſs of the republicans for five days, and gave time to the Auſtrians to recover from their panic and recruit their force. On the fifth day the two armies prepared for a general action. Angereau, who commanded the left wing of the French army, ſtill held Provera blockaded. The Auſtrians and Piedmonteſe attempting to force the centre were repulſed with great loſs; and their left wing which was flanked by the village of Dego, where they were entrenched, was turned by general Meſſena. General Laharpe, in the meantime, paſſing the Bormida with his diviſion in cloſe columns, ſucceeded in turning the right flank of the left wing of the Auſtrian army; and while the diviſion under general Cervoni marched directly towards the centre, general Boyer, with a third diviſion, threw himſelf into their rear, with a view to cut off their retreat. The Auſtrians loſt upward of 10,000 men in this action, of whom 8000 were priſoners, with thirty-two pieces of cannon and fifteen pair of colours; and general Provera, with his garriſon ſurrendered priſoners of war.

On the following day, while the French were indulging themſelves after the fatigues of the battle, they were ſurpriſed at Dego, by general Beaulieu, at the head of ſeven thouſand men. The French were diſlodged, and were repulſed by the enemy three ſeveral times, with general Maſſena at their head, in their attempt to retake it. General Cauſſe, whilſt rallying his diviſion in this affair, was mortally wounded. The day had far advanced before the action was decided. The enemy behaved with an uncommon valor and conſtancy, but the general in chief Buonaparte placed himſelf at the head of the troops, harangued them, and then led them on; the Auſtrians were forced at all points, with the loſs of two thouſand men. After this victory, the Piedmonteſe precipitately withdrew from Monteſimo, in conſequence of which Angereau was enabled to effect a junction with the diviſion that had penetrated acroſs the mountains from Oneglia, and afterwards marched on to attack the enemy's intrenched camp at Ceva, of which after a ſlight reſiſtance he took poſſeſſion as well as of the town. The Piedmonteſe in retreating towards Turin had taken an advantageous ſituation at the confluence of the rivers Cunaglia and Tanaro, on the banks of which they had placed batteries to render their flanks unaſſailable; by this means they were enabled to concentre all their force in the night, and forced the French left wing to retreat; when Maſſena croſſing the Tanaro near Ceva in the night of the twentieth of April, marched along its banks to the village of Lozengo, Buonaparte having made diſpoſitions to reach Mondovi; the Piedmonteſe general Colli apprehenſive of the iſſue of an action where he might be ſurrounded, took advantage of the night to decamp; but at break of day he was intercepted at the entrance of the village of Vies; the centre redoubt which covered the Piedmonteſe retreat was taken, and Mondovi the ſame day. The Sardinian troops paſſed the Stura, between Coni and Cheraſco, extending their line to each of theſe towns, while the Piedmonteſe general eſtabliſhed his head-quarters at Foſſano, a ſmall town lying between both. The attack was general along the river. Cheraſco ſtrong by nature and more ſo by works was evacuated. Foſſano ſurrendered, and Angereau took the town of Alba.

The Piedmonteſe finding it now impoſſible to withſtand the force of the republicans, retreated farther towards Turin, from whence the French were now diſtant but twenty-four miles; general Angereau was alſo about to paſs the Tanaro, on the right flank of the retreating army. Thus ſituated, with no proſpect of effective defence for the capital, general Colli, on the twenty-third of April, propoſed a ſuſpenſion of arms, while his Sardinian majeſty ſhould ſend his miniſter to Genoa to treat for a peace with the ambaſſador of the republic. Buonaparte dictated the conditions, and the ſuſpenſion of arms took place, Turin being ſaved by this timely ſubmiſſion. Having put the French in poſſeſſion of the fortreſſes of Coni, Aleſſandria, and Tortona, conformable to the ſtipulations of the armiſtice, the Sardinian king ſent his miniſters to Paris, who concluded a treaty of peace on the ſeventeenth of May. As Piedmont lay altogether at the mercy of the conquerors, they had it in their power to dictate the conditions. He agreed to relinquiſh in the moſt unequivocal manner the combination againſt France; to renounce for ever all claim to Savoy, Nice, and the country now forming the department of the maritime Alps; to form new lines of boundary, and grant an entire and general amneſty to all his ſubjects who were under coercion for political opinions. In addition to the places ſtipulated in the armiſtice, which were to be put into the poſſeſſion of the French, other fortreſſes on the frontiers of France and of Lombardy were put into their hands, and thoſe of Suſa and Brunetta were to be demoliſhed at his own expence, under commiſſioners appointed by the directory. By this means they enſured what they claimed by another article of the treaty, a free paſſage for their troops into Italy. To fill up the meaſure of his juſt humiliation, he engaged to apologiſe by his miniſter, for the conduct obſerved towards the late ambaſſador of France, and to diſavow the inſult thus offered the republic. This example of humiliation was never more deſervedly inflicted; his weakneſs which ſhould have been a leſſon of prudence, was only equalled by his arrogance; he had been the moſt inveterate and deadly enemy of the revolution; the moſt obſtinate in refuſing terms of accomodation; and during three campaigns had oppoſed the ſtrongeſt barriers to the entrance into Italy. His humiliation and ſeparation from the confederacy was another omenous warning to the allied powers.

The paſſage of the Alps by ſuch apparently inadequate means, in the face of ſo formidable an enemy, has been juſtly conſidered with aſtoniſhment and admiration. The plan which Buonaparte had conceived, with all the temerity of genius and with all the foreſight which belongs to the new tactics of the republic, of dividing the Auſtrian and Piedmonteſe armies in the very centre of the enemies country, and in poſitions which were judged impregnable, were executed with equal intelligence and intrepidity. In this arduous enterprize, Buonaparte was ably ſeconded by the zeal of his generals, each of whom led on his reſpective diviſion with that addreſs and preciſion which could alone have inſured ſucceſs in a war carried on among ſo many natural impediments as the Alps preſent. The battles of Monte Notte and Milleſimo, the movements and ſkirmiſhes, the detail of the various manœuvres, the juctions of diſtant columns, and the good poſitions choſen in this chaos of mountains, by young and comparatively inexperienced commanders, are worthy of fixing the attention of the beſt inſtructed military men. But what will not fail to excite the admiration of poſterity, as it has already forced from their enemies the moſt general applauſe, and from their fellow-citizens the livelieſt affection, was the valorous and generous intrepidity with which their truly republican generals encountered dangers and difficulties in common with their fellow-ſoldiers, by marching at the head of their columns, devoting their lives and ruſhing into the front of danger, thus inſpiring their fellow-citizens under their command with that contempt of death which has raiſed them into heroes, and carried them beyond the bounds even marked for their courage to ſurmount.

After the defeat of Dego, Beaulieu had retreated to the cities of Coni, Aleſſandria, and Tortona, now ceded to the French; upon his ſeparation from the Piedmonteſe, he occupied that poſition to cover the Milaneſe. Conſtrained to evacuate theſe fortreſſes he paſſed the Po at Valenza, and laboured with great diligence to defend the paſſages of that river, as well as of the Gogna and Teſſino; judging by the convention of the French general with the Sardinian king, and the delivery of Valenza, that he meant to effect his paſſage at that place. Buonaparte favoured this miſtake by making a variety of feigned preparations and evolutions on that ſide; the Auſtrian general accordingly waited the attack on the left ſide of the Po, while Buonaparte had puſhed on to Caſtel St. Gioamei, on the right ſide of the river, with a detachment, and had advanced twenty leagues into Lombardy before his march was diſcovered. Mareſchal Beaulieu on diſcovering his error advanced with rapid marches along the Po, in the hope of arriving in ſufficient time to prevent the paſſage, whenever Buonaparte ſhould attempt to effect it. But the French general had reached Placentia early in the morning of the ſeventh of May, the day after his departure from before Valenza, and having ſeized on the boats, barges, and rafts at that place, the whole of the army effected the paſſage in the courſe of the day. Buonaparte having detached parties along the river to guard againſt any movement of the enemy, learned that a conſiderable diviſion of the Auſtrians were approaching to oppoſe the paſſage; he accordingly marched with the forces that had already paſſed, and met them at Fombio, where they had entrenched themſelves with twenty pieces of cannon. After a vigorous reſiſtance, the Auſtrians were compelled to retreat with conſiderable loſs. In the mean while another body of Auſtrians were advancing to ſupport the beaten diviſion, and had reached the head-quarters of general Laharpe, at Codogno. An action took place in which the Auſtrians were repulſed, but the French loſt in general Laharpe a brave intrepid officer and a true republican, who had diſtinguiſhed himſelf at Monte-Notte and Milleſimo with peculiar valour. In 1791, he had been condemned to death by the magiſtracy of Berne for his attachment to the French revolution, he being then an inhabitant of the country of Vaud. General Berthier arrived in the courſe of the action, he took the command and purſued the enemy to Caſſel, of which he took poſſeſſion.

The dukes of Parma and Modena on whoſe territory the French had entered, and who did not expect ſo ſudden an attack, were compelled to demand a ſuſpenſion of arms, which was granted on condition of paying 10,000,000 of livres to repleniſh the exhauſted magazines of the army, and of contributing to the national muſeum of Paris a certain number of the moſt celebrated paintings, at the choice of the general or commiſſioners named for the purpoſe, and finally ſending ambaſſadors to Paris to ſue for peace.

The Auſtrians defeated at Fombio, had made good their retreat to Lodi, on the river Addi, where Beaulieu had concentred his forces. On the approach of the French, they had abandoned the town with ſo much precipitation that they had not time to deſtroy the bridge, which was, however, defended by a conſiderable artillery; and the imperial troops were drawn up in line of battle to prevent the paſſage. On the tenth of May, a ſevere cannonade took place for ſome hours; but the ſhew of reſiſtance appeared ſo formidable on the part of the Auſtrians, that the French generals were for ſome time undecided with reſpect to the manner of the attack. To paſs the bridge in the face of day and the Auſtrian army poſted ſo advantageouſly, was incurring certain deſtruction to numbers; and therefore in the deliberation which took place between the French generals, the majority were of opinion that the paſſage ſhould be attempted at places at ſome diſtance both above and below the town, where the reſiſtance would be conſiderably weakened, if not rendered ineffective. Buonaparte, however, full of confidence in his army, and feeling that delay was more injurious to his plan of operations, than the loſs to be incurred by marching up to the batteries of the Auſtrians, gave peremptory orders that the attack ſhould be made by the bridge. Accordingly before day break, the army prepared for the enterprize, and a column of carabineers, followed by a battalion of grenadiers, paſſed the bridge half way before they were perceived by the enemy. A general diſcharge from the Auſtrians deſtroyed about 700 men; the advanced body of the column was ſtruck with a ſudden terror, and ſtopped ſhort; but animated by the cries of vive la republique from their generals who ſaw their danger, and who advanced at their head, they ſoon rallied; the reſiſtance was ſtill terrible, and the republicans were in ſeveral inſtances ſhaken, notwithſtanding their generals carried the tricolor flag in front and called upon them to follow; it was in a critical moment when all theſe incentives had not produced the deſired effect, that Buonaparte, ſeized a ſtandard and ruſhing to the head of the column, by his voice, geſture, and example animated the republicans to the higheſt enthuſiaſm; they ruſhed forward with impetuoſity, ſeized the Auſtrian artillery, broke through the lines, and threw the Auſtrians into ſuch conſternation that they fled in the utmoſt diſorder. The victory was at once ſplendid and deciſive. The loſs on both ſides was conſiderable, that of the French was the moſt numerous, but the effect of this victory had a ſignal influence on the whole courſe of the Italian war; the valor of the French at Fleurus, at Gemappe, and at Maubege, was rivalled here, and the battle of Lodi became in ſubſequent periods the rallying word of honor, of victory, and glory. Buonaparte loſt no time in purſuing the fugitives, with one diviſion, while with another he entered Milan, which ſurrendered without reſiſtance on the eighteenth of May, and all Lombardy became ſubject to the victors by this ſignal battle.

On the ſide of the Rhine the Auſtrian commander announced to the French general, the termination of the armiſtice on the thirty-firſt of May. The imperial troops were in poſſeſſion of the larger portion of the palatinate from Landau to Bingen. The army of the Rhine and Moſelle, and the right wing of the army of the Sambre and Meuſe, prevented them from penetrating from the banks of the Moſelle to Luxembourg, while the left wing of the latter was intrenched at Duſſeldorf, on the right or German ſide of the Rhine. Mentz alone was neceſſary to the French poſſeſſion of the whole of their ſide of the Rhine, and it appears to have been conſidered as one of the greateſt objects of the campaign. Their firſt operations were ſucceſsful. While the Auſtrians were attacked in the Palatinate, the army before Duſſeldorf aſcended the banks of the Rhine on the German ſide, and on the firſt of June, attacked the Auſtrians in their trenches on the Seig, a river which empties itſelf into the Rhine nearly oppoſite Cologn;

GENERAL BUONAPARTE.

From a Print in the Possession of Mrs. Chalon.

the Auſtriaus were driven from their poſition with loſs, and the French croſſed the Seig. This victory was followed by another ſtill more deciſive at Altenkirchen, on the fourth of June, a village a few miles from the Seig on the road to Mentz; where the imperial troops, under the prince of Wirtemberg, were ſtrongly poſted, to prevent the dangerous progreſs of the republicans in that direction. The Auſtrians after conſiderable loſs were compelled to croſs the Lahn, a river emptying itſelf into the Rhine, above the fortreſs of Ehrenbreitſtein; and ſtill farther on the road to Mentz. The French croſſed this river alſo in purſuit of the enemy, and inveſted Ehrenbreitſtein, a place of uncommon ſtrength, when the archduke who now commanded the imperial armies perceiving the danger of ſuffering the republicans to advance farther in the rear of the army, found it neceſſary to change his mode of defence, and concert another plan of operations. About the eihgth of June he withdrew the greater part of the imperial troops from the Hundſruck, where he had held in check the army of the Rhine and Moſelle, under Moreau; and leaving Mentz and Manheim, which he had hitherto covered with the moſt conſiderable part of his forces, with a ſufficient number to repel any ſudden attacks, marched acroſs the Rhine, with ſuch reinforcements as now rendered the Auſtrian army on the right ſide, which had hitherto been retreating, greatly ſuperior to the aſſailants. This well concerted ſcheme was ſuppoſed to be a flight by the French in the Palatinate. But Jourdan, who had hitherto been purſuing the Auſtrians was ſuddenly attacked by this combined force, and compelled to retreat to his former poſition near Duſſeldorf, having through the badneſs of the roads and the ſuperiority of the force againſt him ſuffered ſeverely.

Jourdan retired within the lines of Duſſeldorf, and Moreau recroſſed the Rhine at Nieuwied. The evacuation of the Palatinate by the Auſtrians, left the army of the Rhine and Moſelle, which took poſſeſſion of the evacuated territory, once more in the preſence of Mentz and Manheim, without any poſſibility of gaining any advantage by its poſition.

Theſe changes of circumſtances rendered a new plan of operations neceſſary on the part of the republicans. While the imperialiſts which had been left to cover the Rhine, and the garriſons of Mentz and Manheim ſuppoſed themſelves to be holding the army under Moreau in check, he kept up a ſemblance of hoſtilities, and feigned preparations for a ſerious attack in that quarter, while he was really drawing off his troops in ſmall bodies by ſecret and forced marches, and had actually arrived at Straſbourg before the enemy knew that he had changed his poſition, on the twenty-fourth of June. The object of this expedition was to effect the paſſage of the Rhine at that city, and to gain the ſtrong fort of Khel on the German ſide of that river.

Moreau had propoſed to make his attack in different places; but a ſudden encreaſe of the river prevented the execution of this plan; the river abounds with ſmall iſlands at this place, ſeveral of theſe neceſſary to his project were covered with water, and the reſt occupied and defended by the Auſtrians, which rendered the acceſs ſtill more difficult. He had taken precautions to conceal his deſign from the enemy, as the leaſt ſuſpicion would have fruſtrated it; but the unexpected obſtacles that now preſented themſelves only induced him to ſupply by courage and enterpriſe what he expected to effect by addreſs. Having made preparations for the paſſage during the night, and finding it impoſſible to effect a landing immediately on the oppoſite ſhores from the rapidity of the current, he began his attack on the iſlands in the middle of the river; of which he gained poſſeſſion after a ſhort ſtruggle, and ſeized on the bridges communicating with the main land, which the Auſtrians had not in the precipitation of their flight time to deſtroy. The French made good their landing, but they were deſtitute of cavalry or artillery, ſince it was impoſſible to tranſport either from the oppoſite ſide. The rapidity of the current prevented the eſtabliſhment of any bridge, and the only reſource that appeared was that of ſending back the boats for the reſt of the army.

This was effected under all the circumſtances of peril and difficulty. A few pieces of ſmall cannon were removed from the Auſtrian batteries on the iſlands, more for ſhew than for actual ſervice. The firſt redoubts were attacked by the republicans in a novel manner, they literally buried the Auſtrians under the heaps of ſtones with which they aſſailed them. The artillery taken on the firſt redoubts were turned on the ſucceſſive ones, and the Auſtrians finding themſelves overwhelmed by the impetuoſity and inceſſancy of the ſtorm, ſaved the remainder of their troops by abandoning the fortreſs to the victors. This brilliant and hazardous enterpriſe not only opened the paſſage into the Briſgau to the French, but as the Auſtrian diviſion under Wurmſer had been greatly weakened by detaching a conſiderable force to the aſſiſtance of the army in Italy, this gallant ſtroke, independent of other collateral advantages, made a powerful diverſion in favour of Jourdan, and enabled him to re-commence offenſive operations, as the archduke was obliged to make a movement to reinforce Wurmſer. Moreau immediately tranſported his artillery and cavalry acroſs the Rhine, by means of a bridge which he conſtructed, and detached parties to forage and ſcour the Briſgau. They drove the Auſtrians from ſeveral poſts and camps in the ſurrounding country, and likewiſe prevented the junction of the detachments ſent by general Wurmſer from Manheim with the army of emigrants under Condé, who were ſtationed along the Upper Rhine.

The archduke leaving behind him general Wartenſleben with ſuch a force as he deemed ſufficient to check Jourdan's progreſs, marched with a conſiderable body to join Wurmſer, and check Moreau's operations in the Briſgau. Moreau, appriſed of this march, determined to attack Wurmſer before he was reinforced; which he did accordingly on the twenty-eighth of June at Rinchen, a village near Philipſburg, on the road to Manheim, and gained in a general action a complete victory. A diviſion of the army under general Laroche, at the ſame time, attacked the prince of Wirtemberg at Mount Knibis, ſucceeded in diſlodging him from thence, and the various fortreſſes on the lofty and immenſe ridge of mountains which divides the circle of Suabia, under the name of the Swartzen Wald, or black-foreſt.

The battle of Rinchen was followed on the ſixth of July by that of Raſtadt, a town ſtill further on the road to Manheim. The archduke had joined with conſiderable reinforcements; the reſiſtance might therefore be expected to be obſtinate. The action commenced ſoon after day-break, and was diſputed with great reſolution and loſs on both ſides. The Auſtrians were defeated, and the French encamped on the field of battle. Driven from Raſtadt, the imperialiſts took a very advantageous poſition near the village of Ettingen; where being ſtill further reinforced they again waited for the republicans. Moreau, apprized that he had now to contend with the whole imperial force, excepting thoſe left on the Lower Rhine, to check Jourdan, called in all his diviſions from the countries they had taken, determined to attack them in their entrenchments.

It appeared from the diſpoſitions made by the Auſtrians, that this battle was deſtined to decide the ſuperiority of either party on the Rhine. Jourdan had already repaſſed the Lhan, after defeating Warterſleben, and appeared before Frankfort. The Auſtrian garriſons at Mentz and Ehrenbreitſtein and others on the Rhine, were now diſregarded by the French, who were about to paſs the Mein alſo; and the Auſtrians were every day more circumſcribed by the approximation of the republican armies on the north and ſouthern ſides.

Moreau having repoſed his troops in the neighbourhood of Ettingen, determined to attack the enemy on the ninth of July. The Auſtrian general urged by the conſciouſneſs that upon this action depended the fate of the war on the Rhine, encouraged his troops by every motive of patriotiſm, honor, and fear of ſhame, to repel the French. The Auſtrians ſtrongeſt poſition was on the heights of Rolenfolhe, and againſt this Moreau directed his principal attack, they were attacked at the ſame time at other points; the Auſtrians were animated to the utmoſt fury, and repelled the aſſailants four ſeveral times. The French were again rallied and reminded of the numbers of their fellow citizens that ſtrewed the ground before them, the paſſage of the Waal, and the glorious victory of their brethren at Lodi, were called up before them, and they were told to emulate the valor of the army of Italy, and revenge the Frenchmen that had fallen. They were ordered to employ the bayonet alone—and the effect was as terrible as deciſive; the Auſtrians were forced along their whole line; their artillery-men bayoneted at the muzzle of their cannon and they fled at all ſides.

The loſs of this battle obliged the imperialiſts to retreat into Germany, and to abandon, Mentz, Ehrenbreitſtein, Manheim, and Philipſbourg to their natural defence. A third body of French were paſſed acroſs the Rhine at Huninguen, and the French completely poſſeſſed the whole extent of country on both ſides of the Rhine excepting thoſe fortreſſes from the borders of Holland to the confines of Swiſſerland.

The laſt actions of Italy had been tantamount to the deſtruction of the Auſtrian army. Part of the diſperſed corps took refuge in Mantua, and the reſt, purſued by the victors, had taken refuge in the barren defiles of the Tyroleſe. This chain of Alps which ſeparates Italy from Germany, gave the French general leiſure to carry on his various enterprizes againſt the reſpective ſtates of Italy. The garriſon of the fortreſs of Milan ſurrendered priſoners of war. A French detachment took poſſeſſion of Leghorn on the twenty-eighth of June, where conformable to the precedent eſtabliſhed by the Engliſh government, in dictating the expulſion of the French and the ſeizure of their property there, all the Engliſh property to an immenſe amount was ſeized, and confiſcated to the uſe of the republic. Meanwhile the main army entered the territory of the Pope, and took Bologna, Ferrara, and Urbino. This expedition gave the French complete command of the poſſeſſions of the Holy Father, and ſo much alarmed the king of the Two Sicilies, that he requeſted an armiſtice, which was granted to him and the Pope under particular ſtipulations.

The conditions impoſed on the Neapolitans were chiefly thoſe of withdrawing their troops from the coalition, and their ſhips from the Engliſh ſquadron in the Mediterranean. Thoſe on the Pope were more circumſtantial and rigorous. He was compelled to ſet at liberty all perſons confined for their political opinions, to renounce the allied powers and ſhut his ports againſt them, to ſurrender to the French the cities they had already taken as well as Ancona, the citadel of which gave them the command of the Adriatic; to pay 21,000,000, of livres, independent of the contributions to be levied on the cities, and to deliver one hundred pictures, busts, vases, or statues, at the option of commissioners to be sent to Rome for the purpose; among the statues were expressly named those of Junius and Marcus Brutus, both of which were in the capitol, and five hundred manuscripts from the Vatican library, to be selected also by the commissioners. The states of Parma and Modena had been already taxed in these articles of taste and science, and it was not to be expected that the capital of the arts, that great repository of what is most curious in the labours of the chissel and pencil should escape the industry of these victorious dilletanti.

The destruction of the army under Beaulieu, which had given Bounaparte the conquest of the whole nothern part of Italy, had excited the utmost consternation at Vienna, and contributed to dispirit the troops under the archduke. It was determined therefore to risk the fate of the imperial arms in Germany by a reliance on new levies, while the flower of the army of the Rhine was detached to Italy under Wurmser. On his approach the Italian powers, disconsolate under their subjection, but without having taken any effectual or sincere steps to ameliorate their fate, were once more enlivened by this new ray of hope, and fondly anticipated their delivery from the imperious sway of the republic by this hoary veteran and a new army. They were fortified in this illusion by the first operations of Wurmser. Having collected the scattered remains of Beaulieu's army in the neighbourhood of Trent and Roveredo, while he threatened an attack on the whole French line, he marched along the Adige, and on the twenty-ninth of July, fell suddenly upon the post of Salo, on the lake of Garda, and the post of Corona, between that lake and the river, which posts covered the city of Mantua. This city had been invested by the French, and the capture of these posts obliged the siege to be raised; the French lost in their retreat a great quantity of artillery and stores. After the taking of Salo, the French division having retired to Peschiera, instead of Brescia as they had been ordered; the Austrians taking advantage of this error took possession of the latter place, together with most of their magazines and hospitals, and thereby cut off their communication with Milan.

The pope on the news of this reverse of the French fortunes, sent his vice-legate to repossess Ferrara, the French having evacuated that place in order to join the army. The Spanish minister Azzara remonstrated on this breach of the armistice with the republic in vain, the vice-legate made his public entry unopposed, but when he set up the pope's arms and took down those of France, the citizens of Ferrara assembled and by force replaced those of the republic.

The position of the French was extremely critical. The garrison of Mantua was now at liberty to act on one side, while Wurmsur was marching in pursuit of Buonaparte on the other. The French general here displayed the capacity of his mind for resources in exigency. The enemy had assured themselves of surrounding him. Suddenly he withdrew his forces from Verona and all along the Adige, by a forced march threw himself with his whole army on the opposite side of Mantua, and retook Brescia with all his magizines. He then concentered his force between the lake of Garda and Mantua, at Castiglione, behind which village Wurmser had drawn up his forces on passing the Mincio. The French had thus retaken all their posts, and an action was determined upon to decide the ascendancy.

On the fifteenth of Auguſt the battle was fought with great obſtinacy and courage, and ended in the total defeat of the Auſtrians, who were compelled to repaſs the Adige, leaving the French once more in poſſeſſion of the country round Mantua. The French from want of heavy artillery could not commence a ſiege, and were therefore compelled to blockade the place. This victory is ſaid to have coſt the Auſtrians 20,000 men; the number of priſoners was very great. A large number of the unfortunate Poles, after the partition of their country had been incorporated in the Auſtrian armies, and ſent to deſtroy the libertics of France, a body of them who had been ſent under Wurmſer quitted the Auſtrian ranks in this action, with their officers and accoutrements, and were incorporated under the ſtandard of liberty, and afterwards formed into a legion. During this engagement which laſted ſeveral days, the inhabitants in Milan, by offering, in the moment when victory was yet doubtful, to organize battalions and march to the common defence, gave very ſtriking evidence of the earneſtneſs with which the Italians embraced the French cauſe; which was ſo much the more unequivocal as the defeat of the French would have rendered the Auſtrians complete maſter of Lombardy.

Though Wurmſer's army was conſiderably weakened by his defeat, he received reinforcements by way of Tyrol, which enabled him to make a reſpectable reſiſtance againſt the republicans, whoſe plan appears to have been to leave a force in the Italian conqueſts, and penetrate through Italy into Carinthia or Styria and to unite with the armies under Jourdan and Moreau on the Danube, or in the centre of Auſtria. Buonaparte having formed the blockade of Mantua with an adequate force, marched along the Adige to attack the Auſtrians entrenched at Mori, and occupying the paſſes of St. Marco. On the fourth of September after a ſevere conteſt, theſe paſſes were taken, the Auſtrians driven from Roveredo, which had long been their chief depot, and compelled to take refuge in Trent. In order to cover this city, the Auſtrian general rallied his troops at the paſs of Calliano, and had taken other poſitions which he deemed impregnable. The intrepidity and valour of Maſſena and his gallant diviſion ſurmounted theſe obſtacles, and after a long and obſtinate conflict, in which the French made ſix thouſand priſoners and took twenty pieces of cannon. this general victoriouſly entered Trent: while Wurmſer drawing of the remainder of his forces to Baſſano, collected the greater part of them in the valley of Brenta. By this manœuvre the Auſtrian general expected that Buonaparte would be led to purſue his obvious deſign of marching through Tyrol, there being no oppoſition to his progreſs; while he ſhould by rapid marches from Baſſano, fall upon the rear of the French, and by cutting of the communication between it and the diviſion blockading Mantua, with the aid of the garriſon of that city, defeat that diviſion and prevent its retreat. Buonaparte inſtead of purſuing that route, took precautions to keep the communication free with all his diviſions, he took ſeveral poſitions on the defiles of the mountains, turned ſhort to his right into the valley along the river Brenta, in purſuit of Wurmſer, and on the eight of September defeated the Auſtrians at Primocalo, at Covolo, at Ciſmone, and laſtly at Baſſano, where Wurmſer had eſtabliſhed his head quarters. Perceiving himſelf thus vigorouſly purſued, Wurmſer had no alternative but to retreat towards Trieſt, by which he muſt abandon Mantua to its fate; or make good his march to that place and reinforce the garriſon with the wrecks of his army. This latter plan ſeemed to him the moſt practicable, he accordingly preſented himſelf before Verona, where he attempted to paſs the Adige, but general Kilmaine, an Iriſh officer, whom Buonaparte had left in that city, fruſtrated his deſign by a ſkilful movement; he was therefore obliged to ſeek a paſſage at Porto Legnano, in which he ſucceeded.

It was Buonaparte's intention to have prevented him from penetrating to Mantua, and he had taken meaſures to ſurround him and compel him to ſurrender; but Wurmſer's marches were ſo rapid that this meaſure could not be accompliſhed. Wurmſer was reſiſted and harraſſed on his march by corps from Cerea, Caſtleano, and Due Caſtelli; but as he had to contend with inferior forces, he ſucceeded in making good his way to Mantua, into which he threw himſelf with all his force. The poſts of Favorito and St. Georgio in the ſuburbs of Mantua were attacked by the French, and taken after great ſlaughter. In this attack it is computed that the imperialiſts loſt 20,000 men. This was the third army which was deſtroyed in one campaign, in attempting to reduce Lombardy once more under the Auſtrian yoke. The French being ſtill deſtitute of a battering train, were compelled inſtead of beſieging to blockade the place.

The ſucceſſes of the armies of the republic on the Rhine correſponded with thoſe in Italy. After the battle of Ettingen, which drove the Auſtrians into the heart of the empire, Moreau took poſſeſſion of Fribourg in the Briſgau, and on the eighteenth of July Stutgard, the capital of the duchy of Wirtemberg. He then croſſed the Necker in purſuit of the archduke, and after various ſkirmiſhes obſtinately fought compelled him to retreat acroſs the Danube, making himſelf maſter of the whole circle of Suabia.

Jourdan, in the meantime, had marched along the Mein through Frankfort, Aſchaffenburg, Wurtzburg, and Schweinfurt, each of which places ſurrendered at his ſummons, and having purſued the Auſtrians under Wartenſleben acroſs the Rednitz, at Bamberg, on the firſt of Auguſt he became maſter of the whole circle of Franconia; threatening at the ſame time the territories of the German princes, and among others the elector of Saxony. A diviſion of the republicans under Ferino had taken poſſeſſion of Conſtance, and of the various fortreſſes on the lake; ſo that the armies now formed one immenſe chain acroſs the whole of Germany, of which the left extended almoſt to the frontiers of Bohemia, and the right to the Tyrolean mountains, ſeparating Bavaria from Italy.

The influence of the republic in the cabinets of Europe was now as predominant as her arms in the field. The duke of Wirtemberg and the prince of Baden, whoſe territories were in the poſſeſſion of the armies, ſent ambaſſadors to Paris to treat for peace. By theſe treaties the duke of Wirtemburg, on the ſeventeenth of Auguſt, engaged to withdraw and always to withold from the enemies of France his forces and ſuccours of every kind; not to aſſiſt individually or as a member of the empire in any war againſt the republic; and to renounce all claims in favour of the republic to any poſſeſſions which he might have held on the left ſide of the Rhine, The treaty with Baden was concluded on the thirty-firſt of the ſame month, the conditions the ſame with an additional ſtipulation for the free navigation of the Rhine, which had hitherto been by various arbitrary regulations ſubjected to exorbitant exactions. Theſe were followed by diplomatic arrangements of greater importance; the treaty concluded with Spain on the twenty-ſecond of July in the preceding year, and the treaty with Pruſſia, were not deemed ſufficiently important to the republic, new treaties were therefore concluded with both theſe powers. The former on the nineteenth of Auguſt, at St. Ildefonſo, the negociators the duke de Alcuida and citizen Perignon; it was ratified by the French directory and the legiſlature on the twelfth of September. The moſt remarkable articles of this treaty were, the mutual guarantee of their reſpective poſſeſſions. The eighteenth article ſtipulated that as England was the only power againſt which Spain had cauſe of complaint, the operation of the preſent alliance ſhould be confined ſolely to that power. Comprehending, however, the Batavian republic, in all the conditions equally and ſpecially. The Pruſſian treaty was not made public, as it appears that many of the conditions were contingents; it has been generally believed, that the Hanoverian electorate with Bremen and Verden were, if conquered, to be ceded to Pruſſia in lieu of the Pruſſian territory on the Rhine. One article, however, was ſoon known; that the Pruſſian monarch guaranteed the freedom and independence of the Batavian republic, and the excluſion of his brother-in-law, the ſtadtholder, an article which the Spaniſh cabinet took care to be aſſured of before the Batavian republic was made a party in the treaty with that power.

The army of Jourdan had poſſeſſed itſelf of the country on both ſides of the Mein, and were meaſuring their paces towards Ratiſbon, while Moreau, who had marched along the Danube, and taken ſucceſſively Ulm, Donawert, and other towns on its banks, paſſed the Lech on the twenty-fourth of Auguſt, near Augſburg, where he was oppoſed with great vigor by the Auſtrians, whom he defeated, and triumphantly entered the circle of Bavaria. The Auſtrian armies, that had retreated with ſo much precipitation, were now daily encreaſing in numbers, by new levies and detachments from the principal cities; while the French were neceſſarily weakened by the fatigues of marches over ſuch an immenſe tract of conquered territory, and harraſſed by the neceſſity of conſtant duty in the enemy's country. The archduke, who had fled into Bavaria from Moreau, having placed his army in an advantageous poſition on the Danube, and on the right ſide of the river Ulm, which divides the dominions of the elector of Bavaria from Auſtria, ſent off in the meantime conſiderable reinforcements to the army under Wartenſleben, which was already equal in number to the army under Jourdan, who was then in purſuit of the Auſtrians, and had arrived within a day's march of Ratiſbon. The right wing of this army under Bernardotte was, on the twenty-ſecond of Auguſt, attacked by forces ſo ſuperior, that he was compelled, in order to avoid being ſurrounded, to fall back on the main body; and Jourdan, finding himſelf in a country where he could expect no reſources, and expoſed to immenſe danger by having general Wartenſleben in front, and the archduke on his flank, determined on an immediate retreat, which he effected with ſome loſs; not ſo much owing to the bravery or good conduct of the Auſtrian generals, as the attacks of the peaſants on the ſtragglers, the diſabled, and the ſick, whom they never ſpared. The Auſtrians at the ſame time hung upon the rear and flanks ſo cloſely that no reſpite was allowed in the march. Jourdan never halted till he reached Bamberg and Wurtſburg; here he halted two days; then having by Wetzlar gained the lower Rhine, there he took a ſtrong poſition.

By this retreat the army of Moreau, was placed in critical circumſtances, as his left flank was uncovered, and the Auſtrians falling on his rear had the means of cutting off his communication with France. Beſide the Auſtrian garriſons of Mentz, Manheim, and Philipſburg lay between the army of the Rhine and Moſelle, which was now inſulated in the centre of Germany. While the Auſtrians were harraſing Jourdan, Moreau puſhed on his conqueſts to the banks of the Iſer without much reſiſtance. He took poſſeſſion of the capital of Bavaria on the twenty-ſeventh of Auguſt, and made the uſual requſitions of money and ſtores, includiug pictures, from the elector, and entered into a preliminary treaty with him for a ſuſpenſion of arms preparatory to a peace, the elector engaging to ſend an ambaſſador to Paris. Moreau hoped that the cloſer he approached to Vienna, the more the archduke would be induced to return, and that the army under Jourdan would be thereby releaſed from the heavy preſſure of the whole Auſtrian force; but the diſcomfiture of Jourdan was ſo complete, that Moreau found himſelf reduced to a ſituation upon which he had never calculated. He accordingly withdrew all his troops from the poſts occupied in Bavaria and concentred his force for a retreat; repaſſing the Leck which ſeparates Suabia from Bavaria, placed his army between the Danube at Ulm and the Lake of Conſtance. The archduke had ordered parties from Manheim and Philipſburg to proceed and co-operate with him in cutting off the retreat of the French. Moreau was alſo preſſed on his flank and rear by the Auſtrian general Latour, who marched ſo cloſe upon him that he found it neceſſary to give him battle, and gained a complete victory over him on the third of October, making 5,000 priſoners. This brilliant action, though it annihilated the army of Latour, did not yet extricate Moreau from all his difficulties. The Auſtrians had ſucceeded in cutting off the communication with the Rhine, by ſeizing all the paſſages of the Black Foreſt, through which Moreau had to retreat, and on all the frontier towns on the bounds of the Rhine and the boundaries of the Swiſs territory.

Twenty four thouſand Auſtrians under Nauendorf and Petraſch were now in Moreau's front; Latour who after his defeat had drawn forth new levies to the amount of 30,000 men again preſſed cloſely on his rear, and the archduke had detached a large body of cavalry to act upon his flank. As the ſteep paſſes of the Black Foreſt were guarded, Moreau ſent off his ſick and baggage under a ſtrong eſcort by that road while with the main body of his army he kept the enemy in check, by continual actions, and ſudden movements, until he reached the Black Foreſt. The part through which he determined to make good his paſſage, was called the Valley of Hell, where in many leagues the mountains riſe ſo boldly, that ſcarcely a ſpace is left between them for fifty men to march in front. This defile formidable by nature, was defended by what was deemed a ſufficient number of troops to cloſe it up; but Moreau's centre ruſhed forward with the moſt daring impetuoſity and overthrew all that oppoſed them, while his right and left, kept in check the Auſtrians on the flank and rear. By this deſparate meaſure Moreau completely extricated himſelf from the imminent danger that threatened him, and brought his army with comparatively little loſs to Fribourg; not only making good his retreat through a hoſtile country of 300 miles in extent, but giving daily battle to an enemy fluſhed with victory; making his aſſailants priſoners by thouſands, and taking from them both colours and cannon. Moreau ſoon after abandoned the Briſgau, ſending his troops acroſs the Rhine at Briſac and Huninguen, retaining poſſeſſion nevertheleſs of the batteries which had been conſtructed on the oppoſite bank to annoy the latter fortreſs; and alſo leaving a ſtrong garriſon in Khel.

Thus terminated an expedition which though its great object was in two reſpects fruſtrated, was yet productive of the moſt ſignal conſequences to France. The brilliant plans of Buonaparte were calculated to reduce the Auſtrian force in Italy, the movements of Wurmſer, and his laſt meaſure of throwing himſelf into Mantua, rendered it impoſſible for him, without relinquiſhing his conqueſts in Italy, to form the junction with the right wing of Moreau's army; on the other hand Jourdan was obliged to purſue a a route into Germany peculiarly difficult, and too remote from the route of Moreau, to preſerve that neceſſary communication which could alone enſure concert and co-operation; Jourdan's army likewiſe, was too weak in numbers for ſo important a ſervice, in an enemy's country, and ſo remote from reſources; theſe united circumſtances caused the failure of the main deſign; but the progreſs of the French generals to the Danube, had ſhewn that by a more vigorous and combined effort, they were capable of reaching Vienna and dictating peace under its walls; but this was not the moſt important effect of the expedition; theretofore the war had been carried on in France, or ſo cloſe to it as neceſſarily to produce a conſiderable ſcarcity, from the conſtant drain of ſupplies for their great armies; by this plan France was not only relieved from that burthen, but it was laid on the enemy; the German countries were not only made to ſupport the French armies but contribute to the payment of the troops and the proviſion of their magazines. There was alſo this further important conſequence that the dangers which threatened Germany, operated as a diverſion in favour of Buonaparte. Upon the whole, the plans of the campaign though not entirely ſucceſsful, were productive of conſequences which accelerated the ſubſequent triumphs, and enſured the projected union of the French armies in the heart of Germany in the campaign of 1797; ultimately decided the peace of the empire, and an important treaty with the republic; which changed the political ſtate of Europe, and broke aſunder that chain of deluſion the balance of power, that for more than two centuries had been the pretext for ſo many cruel and deſolating wars.

Having traced the military operations of the campaign to the cloſe, the civil tranſactions of the republic may now be taken up without interruption. It will be apparent, that the eſtabliſhment of the new conſtitution produced the moſt auſpicious impreſſions for France in the nations of Europe, and the ſuppreſſion of inſurrection at home, and the eclat of three armies abroad, were calculated to give credit, dignity, and ſtability to her meaſures and alliances.

The hoſtile conduct of ſeveral of the Swiſs cantons, towards the republic in the early part of the war, had naturally excited an indignation, which could not be forgotten by France in the moment of her triumph over the force and the machinations of her enemies. The Engliſh cabinet, it was ſuſpected with great appearance of likelihood, had wrought upon ſeveral adminiſtrators in the Helvetic republic by means very uſual with that court and no wiſe honorable to the Swiſs character.* Wickham an Engliſh agent had ſucceeded Fitzgerald, and the efforts of his intrigues had been already manifeſted at Lyons, Marſeilles, and Toulon, as well in various parts of Swiſſerland; he had in the courſe of the previous year continued to open a communication with one of the moſt popular French generals, through the agency of a Swiſs book-ſeller, and to extend that correſpondence to a direct communication with the prince of Conde; a project for the ſacriſice of one of the French armies was laid, and fruſtrated only by the diſagreement of the emigrant leader on the meaſures propoſed, and the jealouſy of the Auſtrian general Wurmſer, who alſo took a ſhare in the treachery. The removal of the French general from the command of the army, upon grounds which have never been publicly declared, but which have been attributed to two cauſes, overthrew the hopes of the Engliſh miniſter in this new plot. Pichegru's conduct in the campaign of 1795, was ſuch as nothing but the moderation which had ſucceeded the reign of terror, could have ſanctioned or ſuffered, and it appears to have been the true cauſe of his removal; though, ſince the diſcovery of the correſpondence which was carried on in 1797, it has been alleged that the directory had already found cauſe to ſuſpect his fidelity to his country.

* Point de l'argent point de la Swiss.

Wickham on the eighth of March 1796 communicated a written note to Barthelemy at Baſle, on the ſubject of a peace, which he ſaid he was authoriſed to convey through him, and to requeſt that (after making the neceſſary enquiries) he would give anſwers to three queſtions; which for the novelty of their form and their inſidiouſneſs, demand exact notice; they were as follows:—

"1. Is there the diſpoſition in France to open a negociation with his majeſty and his allies, for the eſtabliſhment of a general peace, upon juſt and ſuitable terms, by ſending for that purpoſe miniſters to a congreſs, at ſuch place as may hereafter be agreed upon?

"2. Would there be the diſpoſition to communicate to the underſigned the general grounds of a pacification, ſuch as France would be willing to propoſe; in order that his majeſty and his allies might thereupon examine in concert whether they are ſuch as might ſerve as the foundation of a negociation for peace?

"3. Or would there be a deſire to propoſe any other way whatever, for arriving at the ſame end, that of a general pacification?

This note concluded with declaring, that Wickham was not authoriſed to enter into any negociation, or deciſion upon the ſubject, but to tranſmit the anſwers to his court!

On the twenty-ſixth of the ſame month Barthelemy tranſmitted the anſwer authoriſed by the directory, and without noticing the equivocal but arrogant ſtyle of Wickham's note, anſwered that—"the directory of the French republic ardently deſired to procure a juſt honorable, and ſolid peace." That the declaration of Wickham's having no powers to treat appeared to carry an air of inſincerity in the deſires expreſſed by the Engliſh miniſter; that the propoſed meaſure of a congreſs, which would produce endleſs delays, was another indication of the ſame character; and that it appeared as if "this ſtep had no other object than to obtain for the Engliſh government that favourable impreſſion which always accompanies the firſt overtures for peace." The anſwer declared, nevertheleſs, to remove all imputations of a want of frankneſs, that "charged by the conſtitution to execute the laws, it cannot make, or liſten to any propoſal that ſhould be contrary to them;" and conſequently they could not conſent to the abandonment of any territory which according to exiſting laws conſtitute a part of the republic.

Theſe propoſitions, as had been foreſeen, were in a ſimilar ſtrain of arrogant confidence declared to be inadmiſſable, by a note in the London Gazette of the tenth of April; while the French government felt itſelf humbled in being made the momentary dupe of ſuch an application, and having paid a candid regard to a mode of communication at once inſidious and inſulting. The meaſure on the part of the Engliſh miniſter was only a financial manoeuvre, and a ſucceſsful one.

The directory turned its attention at this period to the aggreſſions on the part of ſeveral of the cantons, and on the twenty-ſixth of March demanded from the magiſtracy of Baſle, being the neareſt canton, and that which lay between the army of Auſtria and that of the republic, an explanation concerning certain plans formed by the coalesced powers for violating its neutrality. It was alleged that the Austrians in concert with several citizens of various cantons, had projected the invasion of the departments forming the ancient Franche-compte, by passing over the territory of Basle from the imperial dominions of Frickthal, lying along the Rhine from Balle to Schaffhausen. The communication was made in a manner as contemptuous of the Swiss magistrates as the charge was humiliating, and they felt the resentment intended in sending them only an extract from the registers of the directory. They accordingly replied in a tone of indignation. They denied the charge, complained of the mode in which it was made, and observed "if they were not strong enough to defend their own country, the directory must take measures to insure the safety of the French republic," that they would accept the responsibility of their own conduct, and not only depended on the inhabitants of their own canton, but of the whole Helvetic confederation.

This explanation caused further umbrage, and produced another remonstrance from the directory, demanding decisively a formal exculpation from the charge. This second remonstrance shewed the magistrates at once their former imprudence, and the danger of further temerity. They determined to send an ambassador to Paris; and as their interest and their desires now seriously called for an amicable understanding, they chose citizen Ochs, whose attachment to the French revolution and the principles of civil liberty had been uniformly manifested, and as might have been expected from a disposition thus sincerely displayed, the former amity was restored between the two republics.

Although the public tranquillity had remained undisturbed at Paris, where the different factions were kept in check by government, who had created a seventh minister, called of police, disorders and secret plots had not entirely ceased. The south had been much disturbed by the agents of the allied powers, and France was already divided into districts by the English minister at Basle, who received regular reports from his agents, and dispersed money in every direction. The just resentment of those who had suffered under the proscriptions, and by the abuses of the pro-consular commissioners of the republic, were kept awake by those agents; and the royalists and the religious were encouraged to stifle their peculiar tenets on religion and politics, in order to combine their efforts for the overthrow of the common enemy, which was now represented to possess the government. A commission was appointed by the legislature to enquire into the origin of these troubles in the south, on the twenty-fourth of March. It appeared, however, very soon, that Camille-Jourdan and Isnard, who were the authors of this proposition, were guided by different views, and that it was calculated rather to promote factious purposes than any alleviation of the people's sufferings; the commission was consequently dissolved, and the restoration of tranquillity was left once more to the executive authority.

An insurrection had broken out in the department of Nivre, where the insurgents, under the title of the Company of the King and of Jesus, had taken the town of Sancerre. This was directly suppressed by the vigor of the directory. But faction was not yet appeased, and its effects were felt in the departments of administration, which occasioned a public resolve of the directory, that its confidence had sometimes been betrayed, and its views frustrated by the nomination of individuals to public trust, who proved themselves unworthy. The violence of the old Jacobin party, and those who were alike adverse to the government under any popular form, were now seen united in a common tone of reproach and invective, the former was violently incenſed, becauſe the directory was moderate, the latter becauſe moderation overthrew all hopes of change in the government. This diſaffection was as uſual ſpread among the Pariſians, and what was very unuſual among ſome of the military. The directory began with diſmiſſing all thoſe who ſupported or connived at theſe factious deſigns from public offices; they then ſeverely ſcrutinized the municipalities, and purified them; and commenced a reform in the legion of the police, part of which refuſed to obey orders and declared themſelves in a ſtate of revolt. The corps was entirely diſbanded. The diſſolution of this military body was a fatal blow to the conſpirators; but perceiving that partial movements were fatal to their hopes, and only ſtrengthened the hands of goverement, a plan was formed for the complete overthrow of it and the introduction of a new ſyſtem.

For the ſpace of ſix weeks confuſed murmurs were circulated of a projected inſurrection, but the Pariſians, familiariſed to that term, believed that a law ſome time in exiſtence, againſt large aſſemblies of men without a legal purpoſe, would preſerve the city againſt the efforts of the terroriſts, and paid no regard to the reports. The government, however, did not remain in the ſame incautious ſecurity; early appriſed of the plot, they watched its progreſs and employed themſelves indefatigably to counteract its deſigns by means the moſt effectual and moderate. The decree againſt factious groupes, was their firſt meaſure, the diſſolution of the legion of police the next; this corps conſiſted of 10,000 men horſe and foot, and was compoſed of men ſelected from various diviſions by Hoche, to ſuppreſs the laſt inſurrection againſt the convention; the legion was at firſt moved from Paris on a ſhort route, and thence by gradual and ſmall parties detached in various directions, it was by degrees incorporated with the armies.

This conſpiracy was as theretofore compoſed of moſt contradictory materials; it was from ſome unguarded expreſſions of Drouet, the celebrated poſt-maſter of Varennes, that the directory were firſt led to notice it. His ſtoppage of Louis on his flight, and his conſtancy under the cruel treatment which he had received in an Auſtrian priſon, after he had been taken on miſſion near Tournay, until he was exchanged along with the deputies for the daughter of Lewis, had ſufficiently teſtified his inflexible attachment to his country. The evil lay in the exceſs of his enthuſiaſm, which rendered him and many others at once the eaſieſt prey to artful and deſigning men, and tended to impreſs on the public a ſentiment favourable to any views in which they embarked, however erroneous or miſtaken. A paper publiſhed by Gracchus Babœuf, another enthuſiaſt, diſplayed likewiſe the profeſſed deſigns of the conſpiracy. By a knowledge of a few, the means of diſcovering the reſt were not long wanting; but experienced in the tranſactions of the revolution, they were ſo wary as to place obſtacles to their ſeizure conſtantly in the way. Their committees aſſembled every day, but in different habitations, and in different quarters of the town; Merlin of Douay was miniſter of police, but he was ſuppoſed not to be active in diſcovering the conſpiracy; Cochon was appointed in his room, and he having firſt diſmiſſed all Merlin's agents, choſe two brothers who had been twenty years employed by Sartine to trace the conſpiracy. On the morning of the ninth of May conſiderable bodies of cavalry were ſtationed in the neighbourhood of the palace of the directory, the palace of the legiſlative bodies, and the Pont-Neuf. On the morning of the tenth the guards of the directory and legiſlative bodies were tripled. A meſſage was ſent from the directory to the council of five hundred, intimating that a conſpiracy was prepared to burſt forth the ſucceeding morning at break of day; that the deſign was to murder the members of the directory, the two councils, the field officers, the conſtituted authorities of Paris, and to deliver up the city to pillage and maſſacre; that the government having traced the plot to the moment it was about to burſt forth, they had ſeized on the conſpirators, and with regret they had to tell it, Drouet one of their colleagues was one of them. Along with him were arreſted Laignelot, Chalas, and Ricard formerly a deputy of the convention, Babœuf, the journaliſt, who called himſelf "the tribune of the people," Roſſignol a diſmiſſed general, one of the ſecretaries of Joſeph Lebon, Julien a young man a friend of Robeſpierre's, Amar the accuſer of Danton, Camille, and the Gironde as the agent of Robeſpierre. It appeared that of all the various plans of conſpiracy none had been ſo completely organized as this, and none ſo daring; a directory, a municipality of Paris, revolutionary committees, a convention, committees of public ſafety and general ſecurity, were formed, and all the details of the revolutionary government of 1792, were ſelected, and to be eſtabliſhed until the conſtitution of 1793 ſhould undergo a reviſion and acceptation. Two proclamations were found ready printed in the apartment where the conſpirators were ſeized, one of which was to be circulated in Paris on the day of inſurrection, and the other ſent into the departments, both began with theſe words— "The tyrants are no more." Orders were alſo prepared to be iſſued for ſeizing the repoſitories of arms, the treaſury, telegraphs, and all the public eſtabliſhments in and near Paris. It appeared that theſe great outlines were known to all, but that there was another plan known only to a few of the leaders, and which went to ſacrifice a great number of thoſe who joined in the plot whoſe principles the ſuperiors did not approve. Babœuf acknowleged himſelf to have written ſeveral of the papers that were ſeized; and when examined replied with the moſt undaunted firmneſs; when aſked who were his accomplices, he anſwered, that they knew him but little, if they expected he was capable of denouncing his friends. He addreſſed the directory from his dungeon in a ſtyle reſembling a ſovereign power treating with another; and in one letter of four pages he tells them that the holy inſurrection muſt yet ſucceed, and he menaces them with death if they ſhould not retract all they had publiſhed concerning it; but promiſes, if they behave in a becoming manner, that they ſhall have five ſeats in the future executive council.

The trial of the conſpirators was delaved for a conſiderable time, partly through the ſlow and lenient forms which the conſtitution preſcribes and partly through policy. Drouet through the connivance of the executive power was ſuffered to eſcape, as a man more ſimple than wicked; hut Babœuf and Darthe, were tried before the high criminal tribunal at Vendome and condemned to death.

The diſcovery of this plot produced the greateſt ſatisfaction throughout France, except among the royaliſts and the diſcontented terroriſts. When the queſtion was the overthrow of the republican government, theſe two intereſts ſo oppoſite to each other in form, but ſo much alike in fact, united as one. It is a general and a juſt obſervation, that the failure of a plot adds weight to the eſtabliſhed power, this project of ruin therefore only ſtrengthened the government, and for a while deſtroyed the hopes even of the prieſts and royaliſts.

The government were not amidſt all theſe difficulties of internal trouble, and the vaſt plans of the three armies, in different to objects equally delicate and important. The paper currency under the name of affignats, had declined through a variety of cauſes ſo much in credit, as to become in a degree uſeleſs; gold and ſilver came ſlowly into circulation, but not in quantities adequate to the wants of ſociety. A law was paſſed on the twenty-fifth of March to ſell the remainder of the national domains at the eſtimate made in 1790, which was at the rate of twenty-two years purchaſe, and for which the nation ſhould agree to receive in payment, a new paper fabrication called mandats, which were to be iſſued by government to the amount of two milliards and four hundred millions of livres; of this new creation part was deſtined to draw from circulation the aſſignats, in the proportion of thirty livres in aſſignats for one livre in mandats, and the public lands remaining unſold were to be mortgaged for the remainder. The payments were to be made by inſtalments, and it was hoped as the mortgage was to be foreclоſed at any period, that the value of the mandat would not depriciate. The directory in communicating a meſſage to the councils on this ſubject expreſſed themſelves in language ſo ſtrong on the dangers that would accrue from the failure of this plan, and that if it ſhould not be carried into effect, no reſources would be left to carry on the war even for the preſent campaign; that thoſe who were not converſant with the policy of the directory, and thoſe who wiſhed the ſtatement to be true, really believed that the republic was, as the directory expreſſed it, then on its "laſt plank." The Engliſh miniſter among others, fell into the deception, which was only meant to quicken the legiſlature to a more prompt and liberal diſpoſal of the public money; and was ſo much caught by it, that in the Houſe of Commons he quoted the words of the directory as an argument for carrying on the juſt and neceſſary war with redoubled vigor.

The mandats, however, ſuffered a depreciation, the neceſſary effect of a ſuperabundant iſſue; money itſelf will depreciate in value when it becomes ſo plenteous as to render it very eaſily acquired or more than is neceſſary to facilitate an equable exchange of commodities; paper which is only the repreſentative of an intrinſic value, muſt loſe the value which it repreſents either in proportion to the depreciation of what it repreſents, or the difficulty of obtaining an immediate or an equal quantity in exchange, of the thing repreſented, for the ſign. The original value of the affignats had not ſuddenly ſunk, the decline was gradual, and their total failure was at once the effect of the return of ſpecie to the country, and of an injudicious revocation of the law which made affignats the only circulating medium; for the competition of a ſign with only an artificial value could not be expected to maintain an equal competition with an equal artificial value and the intrinſic value of the bullion ſuperadded to the ſign. The mandats loſt one-fourth at their introduction and they ſoon after became the object of ſpeculators, which deſtroyed them both; the nation however, was releaſed from a great weight of debt by this cupidity of adventurers. To ſupply the public exigencies, the directory had recourſe to a contribution from the property of men of opulence, under the name of a forced-loan; which was ordered to be paid in hard caſh, or in paper at the current courſe of exchange. This tax fell principally on perſons who had acquired their riches in the revolution; but it did not altogether produce the amount at which it had been calculated, as meaſures of ſeverity were not adopted to enforce it.

The committee of finance now preſented a general ſtatement of the public revenue, from which it appeared that the expences would exceed the revenue by 500,000,000, the former one hundred millions. For the deficit various resources were pointed out, and among others the sale of the forfeited lands in the new departments of ancient Belgium, where religious houses of every kind were ordered to be suppressed. From this fund ample resources were provided; and a plan of severe economy was adopted, by all the members of government, and extended throughout the departments.

It has been before noticed, that on the momentary reverse which followed the taking of the French magazines in Italy, by Wurmser, that the pope had ordered his legate to seize upon Ferrara. Negociations had been for some time carrying on at Paris for a peace by the holy father, but they were suddenly interrupted by this precipitate conduct and the negociators were ordered by a mandate issued from the directory to the minister of police, to depart immediately from France. The Sardinian ambassador was at the same time ordered away, but not under circumstances of equal ignominy. The papal commissioners had procrastinated from day to day every definitive arrangement, in expectation of hearing from Italy, that the Austrian arms were successful; while Wurmser was marching from Germany they effected not to possess adequate powers, and when the above event had taken place they proposed terms which they were aware the directory would not listen to. The Sardinian minister had imprudently expressed his regret on the same occasion that his master had submitted to the treaty concluded with Buonaparte. The Tuscan minister Carletti, had made himself odious to the directory by abusing the confidence which had long been reposed in him as a friend of the revolution, by using particular activity to communicate every intelligence which his situation enabled him to obtain, to the combined powers, and he was ordered also to quit the territories of the republic. The resentment of the directory was not confined to the Italian states. The baron Stael was recalled, and Renhausen appointed ambassador from Sweden in his place; the latter was known to be a hireling to the court of Petersburg, and the directory did not consider it consistent with the dignity of the French nation to admit an agent of that kind. The French minister was in consequence ordered to leave Stockholm.

The attack on the government by the conspiracy called Babœuf's, on the twenty-second of Floreal, had strengthened the moderate party. And they generously proposed in order to conciliate all parties, and to promote union and peace, to pass an act of general amnesty for all acts committed between the tenth of July, 1789, and the fourth of Brumaire in the fourth year of the republic, except of those of emigrants and others comprehended in the law of the 3d of Brumaire (27th October) the day preceding the establishment of the constitution. A commission was appointed to prepare and report on this amnesty, and it became the subject of an animated and eloquent debate, and it ended in the exclusion from all public functions, until the peace, of the relations of emigrants and those who had signed papers tending to insurrection.

A petty insurrecton broke out about this time. On the plain of Grenelle, southward of the Seine, between Paris and the hills of Meudon, a camp was formed, which the restless and factious still considered as affording a resource for mischief. They had tampered with some of the soldiers, and were emboldened by their assurances, to form the desparate design of once more attacking the govern ment. The desparadoes accordingly assembled at a tavern, to the number of five hundred, at the village of Vaugirard, and though their intention of visiting the camp was discovered, and the necessary precautions taken by the minister of police and the general, they entered the camp at midnight, crying

"Long live the conſtitution of 1793,"—"Down with the councils,"—"Down with the five tyrants." Having entered the camp, they invited the ſoldiers to fraterniſe, to get rid of their chiefs, and to march under their banners to glory and empire. As the act of rebellion was now completed, the ſoldiers did not delay to execute the puniſhment. The moſt forward of the inſurgents were immediately put to the ſword or ſhot; and the remainder fled in confuſion in all directions. The greater part eſcaped, but one hundred and thirty were taken and afterwards tried by a military commiſſion. Of theſe the greater number were releaſed, the reſt condemned to death or baniſhment according to their former characters. This inſurrection differed from the others only in the inadequacy of the means. Three ex-repreſentatives and ſix ex-generals were concerned in it. The criminality of it was the greater ſince it commenced in the moment that the legiſlature was employed in forming a law for a general amneſty.

The ſecurity that had been uſed with the Swediſh, Sardinian, and Papal miniſters, in diſmiſſing them from Paris, was now extended to the Genevan ambaſſador, Reybaz. This little republic from the beginning of the revolution had been diſtracted by ſtruggles between the ariſtocracy that had grown up in it, and the eagerneſs of the people to reſtore the equality of which their neighbours had now given ſuch leſſons. In 1792, Monteſquiou, the French general, had gone thither, and had taken part with one of the parties. The fluctuation of counſels in France at that period had rendered his conduct obnoxious to thoſe who ſucceeded to power, and he had ſaved himſelf by flight to Swiſſerland. The fall of Robeſpierre produced a new change, and ſome regulations were introduced in Geneva, more favourable to its liberties, but not to the extent required by the generality of the citizens. An application was made ſoon after the eſtabliſhment of the French conſtitution by the Genevan miniſter, Reybaz, requeſting from the directory that the ſame protection which had been given to the Dutch republic in making the acknowlegement of its independence a part of the conditions with thoſe powers with whom it concluded treaties of peace, ſhould be extended to Geneva; that it was of great importance to them, eſpecially with regard to their neighbours the king of Sardinia and certain princes of the German empire. Reybaz had manifeſted a diſpoſition not at all conformable with ſuch a requeſt, and the perſons in power at Geneva were known to be thoſe who had conſtantly ſtigmatiſed the French revolution with the moſt virulent and unworthy aſperſions, and he was informed by the miniſter of foreign affairs, that ſuch a propoſition came with an ill grace from thoſe who had propoſed it; that the people of Geneva had more reaſon to complain of certain of their own citizens, and more to fear from their oppreſſion; but that if the republic ſhould be at any time endangered by the external enemies which were declared to be feared, or the internal enemies that ſecretly oppreſſed it, to inſure its future tranquillity and to control the authors of its afflictions, it ſhould be be incorporated with the French republic. The conduct of Reybaz on this occaſion gave umbrage to the directory, and an order was obtained for his recal. Another was ſent, but he alſo was of the ariſtocratical party, and the directory refuſed to receive him; a third and fourth were ſent, uniformly of the ſame party, and all of them were refuſed, and not even permitted to remain in Paris. Theſe meaſures on the part of France, cauſed ſome further changes in the ſtate and politics of Geneva, in favour of the popular party.

About this period the clergy, convoked aſſemblies, in order to re-eſtabliſh the ſhattered fabric of the Catholic church in France; notwithſtanding the leſſons they learned, howe-ever, and abuſing the moderation and liberality which had been latterly adopted towards ſuch of them as would not attempt to oppoſe the peace of the country and the freedom of the republic, they entered into meaſures in open hoſtility with the eſtabliſhed law, and to the prejudice of the government which occaſioned their being diſſolved by a ſpecial order from the directory addreſſed to the aſſembly or ſynod at Verſailles.

At the ſame time the members of the national inſtitute, actively engaged in the promotion of its great purpoſes, prepared for their firſt public aſſembly, which was held on the fourth of April of this year. The members of the executive directory deſirous of giving ſplendor and importance to this literary ſolemnity, accompanied by the miniſters and all the civil officers of the adminiſtration, went to the hall of the inſtitution in proceſſion. The ambaſſadors of Spain, Sweden, Denmark, Pruſſia, the United States of America, Batavia, Tuſcany, Genoa, Geneva, and others were alſo preſent, and a place of honor was aſſigned them before the eſtrade of the directory. On this occaſion, which may be conſidered as the epocha of the revival of letters in France, all the men of literature, and artiſts, who had ſurvived the ſtorms of the revolution, were preſent. Fifteen hundred ſpectators, aſſembled in that beautiful hall of the former palace of the Louvre, now called the hall of the antiques, of which the architecture is not inferior to the temples of antiquity, and is decorated with the ſtatues of the illuſtrious men of France; the ſcene forming altogether a ſpectacle worthy of a great nation, riſing from amidſt its ruins, with as much grace and majeſty as if it had not paſſed through the ordeal of calamity.

The preſident of the directory made a ſpeech of inſtallation, in which he expreſſed the ſtedfaſt purpoſe of the government to revive the drooping arts, and to ſhield them and liberty from all the attacks of ferocious anarchy. This harangue was received with the loudeſt acclamations. Every heart ſwelled with emotion, every eye melted with tears, at the ſad recollection of the paſt, combined with the ſoothing hopes of the preſent. Duſſaulx, the preſident of the Inſtitute, replied, that every member of that ſociety felt the moſt ardent deſire, to concur towards the proſperity of the republican government, and would aim, in giving luſtre to their own names, to give luſtre to their country; that the republic of letters exiſted before the other—that its ſpirit would neither be enfeebled nor ſubdued—and that amidſt thoſe whom it animated, the love of glory would ever be the ſupport of liberty.

Every power in Europe had already felt the fatal effects of the attempt to enſlave France. Her efforts to repeal the inſidious meaſures of England, had been ſucceſsful only to the diſcomfiture of her aſſaſſinating projects, her ſchemes of forgery, and the defeat of her armies on the continent. The inſular ſituation and naval ſtrength of England placed her in a ſtate of ſecurity againſt direct military attacks, which in her preſent circumſtances France could not overcome. The reduced ſtate of trade and credit was, however, a blow as fatal to the people of England as a war could be, becauſe the affliction was more general and durable. The power of the government, nevertheleſs, ſtood firmly ſupported by the enormous fabric of its funding ſyſtem, the ſource of all the governmental oppreſſions. The Engliſh miniſtry had in the courſe of the year iſſued a proclamation permitting the exportation of Engliſh goods to the Batavian republic and the ancient Netherlands.

The Batavian convention, iſſued a counter-proclamation forbidding under ſevere penalties the entry of Engliſh goods, and calling upon their countrymen by every tie of honor and ſecurity to abſtain from ſuch a commerce; obſerving that it was a project founded on the habitual perfidy and ſpirit of rapine that characteriſed the Engliſh government; that it was intended to exhauſt Bataiva of its money; that it was an inſult as well as an injury, and calculated not only to divide them but as they had conſtantly for two centuries labored to do, to deſtroy the remnant that was recovered from their fatal graſp of the national liberty and independence. The French directory adopted reſolutions of the ſame ſpirit which were ſubmitted to the councils, and on the 22d of October ſeveral meaſures were decreed, by a conſiderable majority to enforce the ſame ſyſtem throughout France; this new ſyſtem of hoſtilities was carried into execution throughout the greater part of Europe, and Engliſh manufactures were for a time excluded from every port between the Elbe and the Adriatic, excepting Portugal alone. Spain had by a new negociation entered into the plan. Genoa inſulted in her own ports by the Engliſh miniſter and ſhips of war, was conſtrained from neceſſity to throw off her neutrality and accept the powerful protection of her neighbour, agreed in a treaty ſigned on the 9th of October to exclude Engliſh ſhips from her ports. Leghorn inſulted ſo long by the Engliſh miniſter lord Harvey, and the violence done on French ſhips in that neutral port, was now in the hands of the republicans, and the Engliſh were of conſequence confined to the ſmall iſland of Elbe near that city to which they had fled. The Italian ſtates generally, and even Naples with whom a treaty was ſigned on the twenty-fifth of October, were circumſcribed in the ſame way. And Corſica which had coſt England ſo much and produced nothing, was entirely evacuated by the Engliſh forces on the fifth of October; the Corſicans having manifeſted ſuch a diſlike to the Engliſh government, as rendered it neceſſary to the ſafety of Elliot, the viceroy, to notify to them his intention to depart, in order to ſave him and his adherents from deſtruction. A treaty was ratified with the duke of Parma. But the negociation with the Pope was much procraſtinated, though committed to a congreſs held at Florence. The Pope was required to withdraw all countenance from the allied powers, to acknowledge that he had been abuſed by the enemies of the republic, and in addition to theſe retractions that he ſhould diſavow any concern in the murder of the French ambaſſador Baſſeville. That he ſhould ſet at liberty all perſons, of whatever country, confined on account of their opinions, and in future deprive no man of his liberty, nor perſecute him on account of his religious opinions; that he ſhould forbid the inhuman practice of the mutilation of children throughout his eſtates, and totally aboliſh the barbarous tribunal of the inquiſition. The Pope held a congregation of cardinals upon theſe propoſitions, who decreed that they could not be aſſented to. Meantime the armiſtice granted to the Pope expired, and the inhabitants of the countries ſouth of the Po had taken meaſures under the protection of the French general to lay the foundation of a new republic, by the congreſs of deputies from the cities of Bologna, Reggio, Modena, and Ferrara: which was alſo adopted by the people of Milan and the ſurrounding countries who alſo formed another republic taking their titles of tranſpadane and ciſpadane from their ſituation in relation to the river Po and Rome; Milan being the centre of the tranſpadane republic. Theſe two, however, by mutual conſent were ſubſequently formed into one republic under the name of the Ciſalpine, in relation to its ſituation in regard to the Alps and Rome. Theſe adopted the forms of the French republic, aboliſhed titles and heraldic diſtinctions, and proclaimed all men equal.

In this year the French detached a ſquadron of ſeven ſail of the line under Richery, who executed an expedition againſt the Engliſh ſettlements at Newfoundland, deſtroyed the fiſhery, and after capturing ſeveral of the annual Quebec fleet, which he burnt at ſea for want of hands to man them, he returned and anchored in Rochelle. The Engliſh took a ſquadron belonging to the Batavian republic this year at the Cape of Good Hope. It was deſtined to co-operate with a French ſquadron in the recapture of the cape, but through ſome treachery in the naval adminiſtration and the corruption of the crews, who refuſed to defend the ſhips, the whole were rendered a bloodleſs capture to the Engliſh. Lucas, the Batavian admiral, was ſent priſoner to England, where he obtained permiſſion to return to his own country, and was tried and acquitted, but died of grief.

The papal court having rejected the terms propoſed by the French commiſſioners, reſolved now to try the force or fortune of arms. Although abandoned by Spain and the Italian powers, the pope flattered himſelf that the imperial armies reaſſembling to relieve Mantua, would ſave him from the humiliation of laying his religion and his ſovereignty at the feet of thoſe political Vandals; he therefore rejected propoſitions renewed to him by Buonaparte on the twenty-ſixth of October, addreſſed to the cardinal Mattei archbiſhop of Ferrara. In theſe the general reminded him of the danger which the holy father was about to involve himſelf, and entreating him to repair to Rome, and adviſe the pope of his true ſituation with regard to the force of the republic. But in vain, the reply of Mattei, after a ſilence of ſix weeks, was a fanatical declamation bloated with bigotry and rebuke. The pope meanwhile, through his nuncio at Vienna, was haſtening the march of the imperial troops, and had appointed general Colli to command his army reinforced by ſome German corps. But the warlike ardor of the ſucceſſor of St. Peter was not ſufficient to inſpire his flock with reſolution adequate to the end.

The fourth Auſtrian army had meanwhile purſued its route for Italy, in order to releaſe Wurmſer, now ſhut up with his troops in Mantua. General Alvinzy had encamped on the Piava, and was advancing towards Vicenza, while general Davidovitch with the diviſion under his command deſcended from the Tyroleſe along the Adige towards Verona. Alvinzy having paſſed the Piava was attacked by the French on the Brenta, and driven acroſs the Piava. The French general Vaubois who defended the paſſes of Tyrol was not ſo ſucceſsful, and Buonaparte was compelled, in order to relieve Vaubois to quit Verona and take upon himſelf to defend the paſſes of the Adige; the Auſtrians having poſſeſſed themſelves of all the country on the oppoſite ſide of that river, and were already preparing to attack the French, with a view to raiſe the blockade of Mantua, by forcing the poſts between the Adige and the lake of Garda. Buonaparte ſaw the judiciouſneſs of the Auſtrian general's plan, and determined to fruſtrate it by preventing a junction of the two diviſions of the enemy. For this purpoſe he led the diviſions under Angereau and Maſſena along the Adige, and on the night of the fourth of November paſſed it at the village of Ronco, by a bridge of boats, hoping to reach Villa Nuova in the morning, and attack the Auſtrians at Caldero, on their flanks and rear and ſeize their cannon and baggage. Alvinzy received information of this movement, and immediately ſtrengthened his poſition, by throwing Croatian and Hungarian regiments into the village of Arcole, through which the French muſt neceſſarily paſs. This village was ſtrongly ſituated for defence, between two moraſſes with canals in each, and kept the republicans in check during the whole day of the fifth. In vain were the French troops rallied by their commanders. Four generals, who ſucceſſively threw themſelves on the bridge leading into the village, were diſabled by wounds more or leſs dangerous. Angereau ſeizing a ſtandard puſhed forward and planted it on the bridge; and Buonaparte, calling to the ſoldiers to remember the bridge of Lodi, inſpired them to another attempt, in which he loſt two more generals, and was himſelf in danger of periſhing. He had detached a diviſion early in the morning to take a larger circuit and enter the village in the rear, this was not accompliſhed till near night when the action became general, and the village with the troops in it were all taken. At day break of the ſixth the action was renewed by an attack upon the whole Auſtrian line. The French right wing, drove before them the Auſtrian left, and purſued it to the head-quarters of Caldero. The centre of the Auſtrians reſiſted longer, but they alſo were compelled to fly before the French centre. The attack of the French left wing, as had been foreſeen, was more difficult; as the Auſtrian right was flanked by a moraſs and numerous ditches. The enemy therefore maintained that poſition. On the morning of the ſeventh, Buonaparte was prepared, with a bridge, which he had thrown over the moraſs and canal in the night, to commence a freſh attack. The Auſtrian centre had now collected in great ſtrength, and while their right was engaged, aſſaulted the French centre with great intrepidity; the French centre gave way for a few moments, and the right was in danger of being turned, when Buonaparte who had ſeen where the brunt of the action now lay, having previouſly drawn off a freſh body of troops from his left and placed them in a poſition where they were totally unſeen by the enemy, ſuffered his centre to fall back, until the diviſion in ambuſcade was in ſuch a ſituation as to fall upon their flank and rear. The effect was anſwerable to the intention; the ſlaughter of the Auſtrians was dreadful; they fled, but rallied with the wings, and ſtill made a formidable ſtand; their numbers were equal to the French and their poſition was ſtrong. Buonaparte finding it impoſſible to diſlodge them by force had recourſe to a ſtratagem, which anſwered his expectations. A few troops of horſe with the greater part of the trumpeters of the army, were detached to make the circuit of the moraſs, keeping unſeen until they ſhould reach the enemy's rear, when having approached cloſe enough to make an impreſſion, the trumpets were to ſound in ſuch a manner as to deceive the enemy into the opinion that the body of cavalry was numerous. A diviſion of infantry greater in number took a circuit on the other flank, they arrived at the ſame moment, that a charge was made by the whole French line, and and the fate of the day was decided; the Auſtrians were purſued and cut down for ſeveral miles, and it was not until night that the purſuit ceaſed.

Vaubois had been again defeated by Davidovitch, and while the cavalry were now in purſuit of Alvinzy's army, Buonaparte filed off and by a rapid march reinforced Vaubois and checked Davidovitch, already conſiderably advanced towards Mantua; but he was forced by Buonaparte to an action in which he was defeated, and forced once more to take refuge in the defiles of Tyrol. The battle of Arcole was peculiarly fatal to the French generals, by whoſe diſtinguiſhed bravery victory was taken out of the hands of fortune. Buonaparte himſelf eſcaped by moſt ſingular good fortune, for his two aid-de-camps were killed by his ſide. The loſs of the Auſtrians in that action was ſo great, that Alvinzy was obliged to retire beyond the Brenta, to await the arrival of another army, and leave Mantua once more to its fate.

It was ſuppoſed that the fate of Mantua would be immediately determined by this action, but Wurmſer had taken advantage of the laſt relief he had experienced, to proviſion his garriſon, which enabled him to defend the town far beyond that calculation.

The return of the French armies to the Rhine was ſucceeded by the reſignation of Jourdan. Bournonville was appointed proviſionally to ſucceed him, and joined the army with a conſiderable reinforcement from Holland. The Auſtrians unable with a ſuperior force to prevent Moreau from croſſing the Rhine in their face, at Huninguen, endeavored without effect to diſlodge the troops from a poſt which had been haſtily thrown up by the French when they firſt croſſed the river. The republicans alſo retained Khel and Nieuwied on the ſame ſide of the river. The Auſtrians taking advantage of a riſe in the river, which broke down the bridge at Neuwied, with a view to cut off the communication between that place and Khel, croſſed the Rhine in ſeveral places to divert the attention of the French while they carried on the main deſign. So extenſive was the enemy's plan, and ſo many were the precautions taken to enſure its ſucceſs, that nothing leſs than the capture of the whole garriſon was contemplated. Moreau however penetrated the deſign, and had taken his diſpoſitions with ſo much intelligence, that he was prepared to receive them inſtantly on the point of attack; the repulſe was as effectual as the enemy's diſappointment was fatal. A few day's after the right wing of Moreau's army made a general movement, and after defeating various diviſions of the imperial army, gained poſſeſſion of ſeveral poſts in the palatinate, among which were thoſe of Bingen and Kaiſerſlautern, and thence completely eſtabliſhed his communication with the interior of France.

A ſuſpenſion of arms was ſoon after agreed upon between the two armies on the Lower Rhine; but contention ſtill ſubſiſted on the upper. The whole force of the imperial army was directed to the capture of the work thrown haſtily up by the French in croſſing oppoſite Huninguen, and Khel was alſo intended to be attacked. At length the Auſtrians ſucceeded in breaking a bridge of boats, ſo that the iſland of the Rhine where Vauban had formerly traced a battery, and which was recently completed, was the only point of communication. The defence of theſe works was entruſted to Abattucci, a Corſican, who rejected the repeated ſummonſes ſent him by the Auſtrian general Furſtenberg. On the night of the ſecond of December, the Auſtrian general with a ſelect body of eighteen hundred men, under favour of a thick fog, attempted to take the iſland by ſurpriſe; they at firſt were ſucceſsful, but the French ſoon rallied and drove them off the iſland with great loſs. The Auſtrian commander was killed on the ſpot, and the republican general died of his wounds the next day. The Auſtrians were ſaved from total deſtruction in their flight by the perfidy of certain Swiſs officers, who guided them over the neutral territory of Baſle; for which violation, on the requiſition of the French, they were ſent by the magiſtrates of Baſle to priſon. Meanwhile the archduke had aſſembled his force before Khel, and began to conſtruct batteries to bombard it. Finding the French determined to defend it, he reſolved to form lines of circumvallation, and opened his trenches on the twenty-fifth of November, commencing with a cannonade which laſted fifteen days without intermiſſion, during which time the Auſtrians were repulſed with great loſs in various attacks. The obſtinacy of the French and the ſeverity of the weather occaſioned the ſiege to be ſlackened; but on the twenty-fifth of December it was renewed. The communication with Straſburg was deſtroyed by the breaking of the bridge and the damage of the boats. The Auſtrians having completed their ſecond parallel, they attacked and carried the French camp and a battery called the Wolf-hole, which protected it. The French thus driven into the fortreſs were rallied by general Lacombe, who led them on to the attack, and having made the retreat of his troops impoſſible by deſtroying the bridges, ruſhed on to the conflict with ſo much impetuoſity that the Auſtrians were completely broken, and obliged to fly with great loſs. The imperialiſts in a few days returned to the attack, and took the camp again, and a redoubt, but after a bloody conteſt both were again retaken, and the Auſtrians ſuffered a great ſlaughter. Khel was now reduced to a heap of ruins. The Auſtrians in a third attack retained poſſeſſion of the camp. The French were now overwhelmed by the enemy's artillery, who had planted cannon cloſe to the very batteries, the communication was cut off; a capitulation was propoſed by general Deſaix, who waited in perſon on the archduke Charles. The latter refuſed the conditions propoſed. Deſaix refuſed to make any alteration, and obſerved that he ſhould make uſe of his laſt reſource with reluctance—"What reſource have you left?" enquired the Auſtrian general; Deſaix replied that he retained only a certain number of determined men, and a ſufficient quantity of powder, and ſooner than ſubmit to a diſhonorable capitulation he would blow up the Auſtrian camp, and both the armies ſhould periſh together. The archduke immediately ſigned the capitulation, and the French had twenty-four hours to remove all their ſtores, and the artillery which they had employed in this glorious reſiſtance.

At firſt ſight this obſtinate defence of a barren fortreſs, may appear wanton and fruitleſs. But as the French could not advance into Germany from the circumſtances of the army and the ſeaſon; the reſiſtance at thoſe fortreſſes employed the whole of the Auſtrian force under the archduke, harraſſed them, leſſened their force, deſtroyed their proviſions, and by preventing them from puſhing their force to the left of the Rhine ſaved that country, and left ſo much of the ground freed from obſtruction againſt his ſecond glorious expedition into Germany: the archduke was likewiſe prevented from detaching part of his army to the aſſiſtance of Alvinzy.

The ſurrender of this fortreſs cloſed the campaign of 1796. A campaign which had effected in the ſpace of a few months more than had been ever before atchieved in the courſe of the longeſt war; which had ſhaken Europe to its foundations, and ſubjected the vaſt line from the frontiers of the northern ſea to the Adriatic-gulph to the ſway of the French republic. To the French it was in all points fortunate and glorious, for although their armies had been compelled to retreat from the Danube and re-croſs the Rhine; yet the invaſion of Germany paralyſed the hoſtile league againſt them; and beſides relieving France from the burthen of war and the maintenance of its own armies, it had exhauſted the enemy and detached ſeveral powers from the alliance.

Amidſt theſe triumphs the financial affairs of the republic continued to demand an active regard. The bankers and merchants of the republic had been called upon to ſuggeſt to the miniſter plans for the public ſervice, and even an aſſembly of them was called to deviſe and deliberate upon means to revive public credit. On the tenth of December the directory communicated to the councils a ſtate of the public wants in a very preſſing form, and urging, as on a former occaſion, the immediate neceſſity of relief, adding, that in all the different adminiſtrations, down to the offices of ſmalleſt diſburſement, the funds were in a ſtate of decay bordering on deſtruction. The remedy for theſe evils, the directory ſaid, was in the councils' giving their aſſent to the application of the laſt part of the payments for the national domains, which amounted-to eighty millions and was to be paid in money. Party had already become ſo formidable in the council of five hundred, that the meſſage of the directory was paſſed over unnoticed. It had been communicated with ſecrecy, but the manner in which it had been treated induced the directory to give it the utmoſt publicity, in order to appeal to the patriotiſm of the people againſt the conduct of the council. Camus, preſident of the commiſſion appointed to enquire into the finances, found it neceſſary to defend the council, and drew ſuch a picture of the public reſources as was highly flattering to the country. The truth however lay on both ſides, the country poſſeſſed the reſources deſcribed, but the revenue was exactly as ſtated; the directory wiſhed them realiſed, and public opinion declared againſt the factious influence thas was manifeſted to oppoſe meaſures ſo eſſential to the national proſperity. Theſe circumſtances cauſed ſome differences among the members of government which were fomented by perſons inimical to both parties.

Amidſt the various negociations which in the courſe of the year occupied the French government, that which England profeſſed to open, engaged moſt deeply the public attention of the two nations. The defection of powers from the coalition was an alarming teſtimony of the French power. Although the Auſtrians and Pruſſians appeared firſt in the war, it was well known that the Engliſh court was from the beginning at the bottom of it, and was only reſtrained from an open declaration by the great weight of opinion among the Engliſh people. Regarding England therefore as a wanton and unprovoked aſſaſſin, the author of all the calamities which France had felt from war, ſhe could ſcarcely look on the deſolation that had taken place without abhorrence of the cauſe of it. An offer from ſo treacherous and faithleſs a power was naturally regarded with a jealous and ſuſpicious eye by the French government. There were beſide other circumſtances, which rendered the overture doubly ſuſpicious. The time at which it was made, on the eve of the opening of the Engliſh parliament, when it was neceſſary to the miniſter's financial negociations to make a favourable impreſſion on the monied intereſt of that country; and juſt on the eve of the Engliſh plenipotentiary Malmſbury, ſetting out for Paris, another agent (Hammond) had been diſpatched to Berlin to bribe the Pruſſian monarch into a reunion in the hoſtility againſt France. Theſe circumſtances were all perfectly underſtood by the French directory when the miniſter of foreign affairs, Charles Delacroix, received an official note demanding paſſports for an envoy to open a negociation at Paris. The Engliſh miniſter arrived, and on the twenty-fourth of October preſented a memorial, in which he propoſed the eſtabliſhment of ſome general principle on the opening of the negociation, which ſhould ſerve as a baſis for a definitive ſettlement; obſerving that the firſt object of a negociation for peace was generally that of reſtoring or giving up what had been taken from the reſpective parties during the war; that England had no reſtitution to demand, but by a ſeries of uninterrupted ſucceſſes acquired numerous colonies of ineſtimable value; and as on the other hand France had made conqueſts from the allies of England, it was propoſed to make proportional reſtitutions the baſis of the treaty.

Delacroix in reply urged, that as Malmeſbury ſpoke in the name of the allies of England, it was to be preſumed that he had powers to treat for them. To this reply was made that Malmeſbury was not thus commiſſioned; but that as ſoon as the directory ſhould agree to the principle, he would diſpatch couriers to the ſeveral courts to give an account of the ſtate of the negociation and to receive their inſtructions. He was then aſked if he would give any preciſe idea of the principle of reſtitution ſo far as concerned England and France. To this he replied, that as ſoon as the directory ſhould explain themſelves he would ſend couriers for inſtructions. This mode of proceeding appeared in its true light to the directory, it looked ſo much unlike the conduct of ſincerity, and ſo truly reſembled purpoſed contempt, that neither the high ground upon which France ſtood, the credit of the government, nor the pride which the nation naturally felt at their triumphs over the aggreſſions of all Europe, would admit of receiving the diſingenuous proceeding but with diſtruſt and reſentment. The anſwer was therefore ſuitable to theſe impreſſions. It frankly declared that the mode adopted by the Engliſh cabinet left the hope of peace very diſtant; that if the miniſter had confined himſelf to his own court, upon which he profeſſed to be authoriſed, inſtead of ſetting up pretenſions for others, from whom he confeſſed he had no authority, the negociation might be ſhortened. It was added that as the declaration he had made was not ſupported by his credentials, ſo he might have received ſecret inſtructions contrary to thoſe he profeſſed; that the Engliſh cabinet did not appear ſincere, and had a double view in the preſent application, firſt of hindering other powers from treating ſeparately, and ſecond, of obtaining with greater facility the ſupplies from the Engliſh people for the continuance of the war. It was further urged that the propoſitions now made differed from thoſe made by Wickham ſome months preceding, only that the form was more polite. With regard to the principle of reſtitution, propoſed to be made the baſis of negociation, it was from the confeſſions of the envoy vague and indeterminate, and as ſoon as he ſhould obtain full powers to treat from the courts concerned, the directory would then be ready to treat with him.

Malmeſbury, who had continually diſpatched couriers to England from day to day, and received freſh inſtructions; replied to the note of the French miniſter, and complained of the harſh tone of this laſt note; he urged that the French government miſtook the powers with which he was entruſted, as he had no powers to treat ſeparately from the allies; and he inſiſted that his powers were adequate to the concluſion of a juſt peace. It was however evident that having no powers to treat for the allies, they could not be bound by his ſtipulations, nor could the directory have any ſecurity for the fulfilment of any articles concluded upon in their names.

Malmesbury again urged the meaſure of proportional reſtitutions. He was requeſted to point out the ſpecific objects propoſed; they expreſſed their ignorance of any pacific diſpoſitions on the part of the allies, which he had alledged, they obſerving on the contrary, that the emperor had been the firſt to break the armiſtice on the Rhine. To this he replied that he was not authoriſed to point out the ſpecific objects until the principle was agreed upon. The frequency of the couriers diſpatched to England upon the receipt of every note became truly ridiculous. The directory, however, to ſhorten the farce, obſerved that the adoption of the principle of reſtitution propoſed as a baſis of negociation could have been no real obſtacle, as it had been virtually adopted from the beginning on their part, the deficiency of powers being the only obſtacle in the way of it; that in order to remove all cavil, they now formally recogniſed it, and deſired that the objects of reciprocal compenſation ſhould be ſpeedily and categorically pointed out.

Malmeſbury therefore communicated two memorials, one of which was propoſed to be ſecret. The firſt propoſed that France ſhould cede Brabant and all the conquered country on the left of the Rhine to the emperor, together with all that had been taken in Italy and elſewhere; that the court of Peterſburg ſhould have full liberty to interpoſe in the negocia-tion at any time, and that Portugal ſhould be comprehended in the treaty, and made free of all indemnification to France for the part ſhe had taken in the war. As a compenſation for theſe ceſſions, the French poſſeſſions in the Eaſt and Weſt-Indies were to be reſtored, and certain eſtabliſhments on the river St. Laurence, North America; reſerving nevertheleſs to England the right of requiring a compenſation for agreeing to the ceſſion of the Spaniſh part of St. Domingo to France.

The ſecond and ſecret memorial reſpected Spain and the Batavian republic; it was obſerved that as no conqueſts had then been made from the former, no reſtitution was to be made. The Batavian republic was otherwiſe ſituated; the re-eſtabliſhment of the ſtadtholderian governnment was urged as an indiſpenſable condition to induce the ceſſion of what had been taken from them in the Eaſt and Weſt-Indies; and even in that caſe all was not to be reſtored. It urged additionally, that in the matter concerning the Batavian republic, the negociations ſhould not be conducted through the medium of France, but between the Engliſh and the Batavian governments directly; but it was to be underſtood, that as an indiſpenſable preliminary, the territory ceded by the Batavian republic to France ſhould be reſtored, as the ſafety of the Auſtrian Netherlands would be committed by the retention.

Theſe memorials having been preſented with a letter from Malmeſbury, urging his anxiety to enter into explanations and to receive any counter-project on their part; a meſſage was returned by the miniſter for foreign affairs, but inſtead of the uſual form of a note, it was a bare extract from the regiſter of their deliberations, and contained a requeſt that the memorials ſhould be ſigned by Malmesbury, and requiring alſo the ultimatum of his demands in twenty-four hours Malmesbury without noticing the form of the meſſage, complied with the requeſt for affixing his ſignature, but obſerved that the peremptory demand of the ultimatum ſhut the door on all negociation; and added, that if the propoſitions preſented by him were not ſatisfactory, he would lay any they might propoſe before his court. At this point the negociation terminated, for on the reading of the memorials on the eighteenth of December, which were received the preceding day, they ordered the miniſter Delacroix to write to Malmesbury, that they could not hear nor had they powers to treat upon any propoſition contrary to the conſtitution and the laws and treaties by which the republic was engaged; and they added, that as the envoy had found himſelf obliged on every minute occaſion to diſpatch couriers for advice to his court, the negociation in his hands was purely paſſive, and his reſidence in Paris was of conſequence ſuperfluous and inconvenient, ſince the negociation might as well be carried on by the couriers themſelves; they therefore enjoined him to leave Paris in forty-eight hours. Paſſports were demanded and granted, and he left Paris in the time preſcribed.

The French people were much diſſatisfied at the diſmiſſion of the Engliſh envoy, as in the firſt ſtages of the negociation the French government made it a point to give publicity to all the documents interchanged, in a Journal which was under their patronage. Malmſbury had, however, remonſtrated againſt this publicity at a particular ſtage, and the directory aſſented to proceed no further in the publication. The public were then in poſſeſſion of the overtures, which bore a favourable aſpect externally, but the main articles of the memorials were now undiſcloſed. They were however, no ſooner publiſhed, than divided as the people were on the ſubject of the negociation, and anxious as all claſſes were for the return of peace, than the utmoſt indignation ſucceedeed and pervaded all deſcriptions of perſons. The extravagance and impudence of the propoſitions were univerſally acknowledged, and thoſe who had before inveighed againſt the directory for their ſuppoſed rigidity now applauded them for their firmneſs and regard for the honor of their country and fidelity to their alliances.

In thoſe propoſitions the domineering inſolence and boundleſs rapacity of the Engliſh government was ſtrikingly manifeſted. They propoſed to treat for Portugal and they wiſhed to prevent France from treating for the Batavian republic, and at the ſame time that they profeſſed ſo much earneſtneſs for the reſtoration of the ſtadtholder and his government, they alſo wiſhed France to reſtore the ceded territory, while they who had involved the Dutch in all their miſeries declared that they would not reſtore the territories of which they had plundered them! France that had conquered all Europe united, that had formed new and binding alliances with ſeveral of thoſe powers which ſhe had beaten out of the coalition, powers which ſhe had obliged likewiſe to guarantee the independence of the Batavian republic was called upon to break her treaties and guarantees, to relinquiſh her conqueſts, and to ſacrifice even the colonies of thoſe very people who had been involved in the war by England. The intereſts of the Batavian republic were indeed ſo interknitted with thoſe of France, that the Engliſh miniſtry muſt have been conſcious that the negociation could never ſucceed merely upon the prepoſterous nature of the points that concerned her.

The French government had in the courſe of the year, turned its attention to a project of hoſtility againſt the Engliſh government, which if ſucceſsful would have decided the fate of that nation as a great power. Preparations had been making during the ſummer, and information had been obtained by the directory, from perſons eſpecially ſent to Ireland concerning the diſpoſitions of the people of that country. It was found that the cruelty and oppreſſion of the Engliſh government was ſuch in that place, that of upwards of four millions and a half of people, thoſe affected to the government did not actually exceed above an eighth of the whole. That of the remaining ſeven eighths more than one half were warmly diſpoſed to riſk every thing to ſhake off the Engliſh yoke, and that the reſt were ſo much abſorbed in ignorance and miſery, that a powerful landing made, would effectually decide them againſt their oppreſſors under whom they groaned in ſullenneſs and deſpair. It was found that the uſual artifice of the Engliſh nation, and by which it had kept that country in chains for more than ſix hundred years, the excitement of religious hatred and jealouſy, had now failed of its uſual effects, and the ſects which had been yoked in the moſt conſtant and relentleſs hoſtility againſt each other, by whoſe diviſion England conquered, had from their common oppreſſion learned to conſider the unhappy deluſion in which they had been foſtered, and were ready to break their bonds on the heads of their tyrants. The French government very juſtly conſidered Ireland as the great depot from whence England drew immenſe bodies of men for her armies and navy, as a great magazine from whence ſhe drew a great abundance of the firſt neceſſaries of life, ſupplies for her navy and the baſis of her woollen manufacture, and as her firſt mart for the conſumption of the Engliſh fabrics and manufactures. To rend that arm from England was to reduce her to the rank of one of the third claſs of ſtates from that of the firſt. This ſtate of things in Ireland rendered it only neceſſary to ſend a moderate force with a large ſupply of ammunition and arms, under the protection of a ſmall fleet. The only difficulty lay in effecting the landing. The French had during the laſt century ſeveral times thrown troops into Ireland, and with very conſiderable fleets had entered the Iriſh ports. In the ſpacious bay of Bantry on the ſouth-weſt coaſt of that iſland, the French fleet had defeated an Engliſh one ſuperior in numbers, and had at other times anchored there. The diſtance of that bay from the chief port of Ireland, the great ſtorehouſe for proviſions, was only two days march for an army from it, and the country was in that ſtate of diſcontent and ill defended that a landing muſt have the moſt aſſured ſucceſs. Theſe conſiderations encouraged the equipment, and it was about to ſail when the Engliſh miniſtry diſpatched the overtures for a peace, which occaſioned the ſuſpenſion of the expedition for a few days. The ſquadron intended to convoy the troops and ſtores conſiſted of eighteen ſhips of the line, thirteen frigates, twelve ſloops, with tranſports having on board 25,000 men, under the command of general Hoche. The fleet left the inner roads of Breſt on the tenth of December, and in going out of the paſſage of the Raz, one of the line of battle ſhips was loſt and another damaged and rendered unfit for ſea; it was ſome days before they had orders to put out, as the negociations pending rendered it neceſſary. The Engliſh miniſtry appear to have been deceived in the object of this expedition, for as the French publicly declared that its deſtination was Ireland, that was conſidered only as a report to delude attention from another object, ſuppoſed to be Jaimaca or the Portuguſe ſettlements.

The inclement ſeaſon in which the expedition was undertaken, appears by the event to have been badly choſen; the motives for the choice, however, were judicious as the fact proved, for notwithſtanding the boaſted power of the Engliſh navy, the French fleet and its convoy actually arrived off that coaſt in defiance to a ſevere ſtorm which ſeparated them, and which obliged ſeveral of the ſhips to return to port. The French diviſion under admiral Bouvette, conſiſting of eight ſhips and ſeveral frigates and tranſports actually anchored in Bantry-bay, where they remained four days, expecting the admiral and the commander in chief, who had both embarked in a large frigate which was ſeparated in the ſtorm and never joined them. As Hoche was the only perſon entruſted with the orders of the government, Bouvette judged it expedient not to purſue the expedition by a landing: a council of war was held in which the whole of the members were unanimous except the vice admiral for to land; and it was expected he would have given way to the general wiſh; the troops in the bay amounted to 15,000 men, and notwithſtanding their being viſible four days, no military force appeared, and the diſpoſition of the country-people was ſtrongly indicated by their driving flocks of ſheep and black cattle down to the ſhore; the pilots gave alſo ſuch information as encouraged a landing, and ſeveral Iriſh officers who were on board, well known in the country, and capable of forming the beſt judgment of the ſucceſs of ſuch an enterprize, were in common with the French commander of the military, eager to land the troops. The wind which had hitherto blown from the ſouth-weſt, and which was ſo favourable to a landing and unfavourable to their return, encouraged the hopes of the adventurers, but Bouvette had reſolved to return in ſpite of the remonſtrances of the military commander. A change of wind occurring, Bouvette hoiſted his ſignal for ſailing, and on the thirty-firſt of December the ſquadron returned to Breſt, where he arrived in ſafety, without having ſeen an Engliſh ſhip. One frigate was taken by the Engliſh; ſhe had been diſmaſted in the gale; another veſſel with warlike ſtores was alſo captured; and a ſhip of the line that had been ſeparated from the fleet, after encountering two Engliſh ſhips of the line, was run on ſhore by the captain in order to prevent her falling into the hands of the enemy. Bouvette on his return to port was put under arreſt, on the accuſation of a military officer, and he certainly merited puniſhment, as the ſtate of the defence of Ireland at that time ſufficiently proved, and as there was concluſive evidence that had only a thouſand French marched to Cork, it would have been ſurrendered to them with proviſions deſtined for the Engliſh navy to the value of three millions ſterling, and that they would have had auxiliaries already practiſed in the uſe of arms to the number of 150,000 men and upwards. The Engliſh troops in the whole Iſland at that time, including the Scotch regiments, did not exceed 18,000, the remainder conſiſting of Iriſh regulars amount to about 24,000, beſide militia amounting to about 40,000, three fourths of which, with all the Iriſh artillery, as fine a corps as any in Europe, would have inſtantly declared for the country, and joined the republicans. The Engliſh government were not long ignorant of the good fortune which the winds and the miſconduct of the French vice-admiral favored them with; as they ſoon after augmented the Engliſh and Scotch troops in Ireland to the amount of 60,000 men, and removed not only the whole of the Iriſh artillery to the Weſt-Indies, but drafted the regular Iriſh regiments in ſmall numbers among the regiments in England and Scotland, and ſent ſeveral whole regiments abroad to the colonies. The French government, however, did not relinquiſh the project of invading Ireland, and freſh preparations were made in the next year, when the whole plan was fruſtrated by the communication of the deſign to the Engliſh miniſtry, from ſome perſons in the confidence of government. The plans and all that concerned it were under the care of the director Carnot, who was implicated in the vaſt conſpiracy in the next year to overthrow the government, which he had ſo large a ſhare in eſtabliſhing by his talents. It has never been ſaid that he communicated the deſign to the Engliſh miniſters, but it certainly was betrayed from his department, and at the preſent period he can neither be accuſed nor exempted from the criminality. In the year 1798, however, the plan ſeems to have been revived and blended with a more extenſive project of invaſion againſt England, concerning which the authentic evidence will become a part of future hiſtory.

Whoever attempts to lay open the tranſactions of nations and public men ſhould be above the reach of power, and indifferent alike to enmity or fear; intereſt of every kind ſhould be out of his contemplation, and devoted to truth alone he ſhould alike ſpurn the trammels of prejudice and the animoſity of corruption; of ambitious jealouſy, and of every ſpecies of faction. Neither ſhould he confine himſelf to a bare recital of the tranſaction that are produced for hiſtory, or of the actions alone of thoſe who are concerned in them, but he ſhould endeavour as much as in him lies to open the motives and principles from which they took their riſe, and upon which they proceeded to their iſſues. When in public tranſactions in which all parties are concerned, ſome perſons are of neceſſity and others from choice more than ordinarily conſpicuous, it is not barely ſufficient to mention their names. The hearts of the actors ſhould be opened if poſſible, and the reader let into his motives and deſigns, and favoured with a ſight of thoſe ſecret ſprings which moved them in their enterprizes. If ſuch narrations fluſh the faces of living characters. It will be with them to ſhew that the ſuſpenſion is not the effect of conſcious ſhame, but of offended innocence; but unleſs it is ſo ſhewn the hiſtorian muſt be juſtified, ſince open only to truth and conviction, the page muſt confer infamy when it is dictated by any other motive than that which hiſtory demands—hiſtory is philoſophy teaching by example.

Among thoſe nations of Europe from which America receives the bulk of her literary productions, the freedom of the preſs is more or leſs reſtrained, and tranſactions in which thoſe nations are concerned are either from fear, apprehenſion or partiality very frequently repreſented without a ſtrict regard to fidelity. This diſadvantage unfortunately is not confined to the people among whom it originates, but extends its influence too often over the unſuſpecting minds of other nations. That while the productions of foreign preſſes are received as oracles and the perfect ſtandard of literary and political inveſtigation, the genius of America rarely ventures beyond the bounds of an aphemeral pamphlet, content to be tributary to other nations for ideas and opinions in common with their manufactures.

In treating of the French revolution their ſentiments may at firſt ſight appear irrevelant; but a cloſer conſideration will ſhew, that in touching upon that part of the French hiſtory which relates to the American republic, the ſubject which moſt concerns the people where this volume is rapidly ſtretched ſhould not be taken up with the lightneſs of a mere topic of amuſement, but examined in all its latitude. On this account then, it appears to be neceſſary in America to obviate the common diſregard in which Americans too generally hold the productions of their own country, and to claim for the view which is now to be taken of the tranſactions with France that diſpaſſionate conſideration to which the opinions of every man who expreſſes himſelf which decency is entitled to.

While this hiſtory is yet committing to the public eye, the differences that have ariſen between the French and American governments, are placed in a very delicate ſtate of ſuſpenſe. The ſentiments that may be delivered here will not, from their limited circulation, the obſcurity of the author, and much more from the unhappy ſtate of party, be likely to obtain any conſiderable ſhare of regard or notoriety; but they may ſerve to afford, what is the beſt uſe of all hiſtory, important objects of reflection to thoſe whoſe attention may be turned ſeriouſly to the ſubject.

The evil and the good fortune of nations is too often dependent on accidents, on trivial cauſes, on the violent paſſions or the weakneſſes of a few individuals. It is from this circumſtance that popular governments on the wideſt poſſible baſis are ſo much preferable to the extremes of an individual or partial authority. It is to guard againſt the frailties or the vices of individuals that free nations have taken from the magiſterial office the power of involving nations in war; and this improvement in government has not only been found ſalutary in the experiment, but ages have diſplayed how fatal the want of ſuch a principle has proved in the adminiſtration of various governments. All the wars of Europe have originated in the madneſs of a few individuals. There is no inſtance on record of a free people having embarked in a war of aggreſſion. There is ſome danger of America being involved in a war, and the hiſtory of the riſe of that danger is therefore a moſt intereſting topic. It has been already diſcuſſed in Europe, and it cannot be diſguiſed that in both the nations with whom America has been involved politically the reputation of the American people and government have been attacked, but without equal juſtice.

In order to a juſt comprehenſion of the ſubject, it will be neceſſary to go back to a period long anterior to the French revolution, in order to ſhew the grounds of ſubſiſting differences. Before the viſible dawn of American freedom, the colonies were known to Europe but as the magazines from which England drew materials for her fabrics, her manufactures, and her commerce, or as a mart which England had inſured for the ſale of her manufactures to the excluſion of all the world. The war of 1755 and the peace of 1763, threw a momentary eclat over the American character, which would have ceaſed with the remembrance of the war, were there no new circumſtances to call forth attention. An obſcure man, a native of America, penetrating the gloom in which this vaſt continent was obſcured, by the force of natural genius and the ſtrength of his mind, placed himſelf without effort among the firſt philoſophers of the age. The noval but unaffected ſimplicity of his character and manners, and the novelty of America producing ſuch a man, at a critical period, threw a radiance round his country which while it centred in him extended the regard to all his countrymen. An aſſociation of ideas very natural to man, combined the American planter or farmer with the philoſopher; the charms of the climate and the independence of the cultivator, the joys of abundance and the happy ſtate of rural innocence, were all topics too faſcinating not to excite an affection or a reſpect for thoſe who poſſeſſed them; the moral apothegms of Franklin ſoon became as celebrated as his philoſophical experiments were new and ſucceſsful, and Europe learned to conſider the American people as a ſociety whoſe wiſdom and virtue rivalled if not ſurpaſſed the claſſical Arcadians.

The eſtabliſhment of the poſt-offices in America, and the proceedings at Albany in 1754 were ſoon found to have in them the hand of a maſter in politics, and the immortal examination before the Engliſh privy-council ſtamped the ſeal of greatneſs on the American name in the eyes of Europe. From thenceforward the world became intereſted in the American character, and admiration ſoon becnme love. It was under theſe impreſſions, which pervaded all Europe, but eſpecially the minds of the learned, that the American revolution commenced. The celebrated Farmers's Letters tended to increaſe the paſſions of Europe in behalf of America. Franklin, whoſe fame had already opened him a free correſpondence with the literati of the European continent, was, with perfect wiſdom diſpatched to France, where he found the public mind greatly influenced by men of letters, peculiarly prepared to give him the moſt flattering reception. The father of the American liberties became the object of general reſpect and love, and the opinions which had been before propogated concerning the character of the Americans were found realized in the chearful ſimplicity and the temperate equanimity of the philoſophic envoy.

Vergennes whoſe principles united the arbitrary policy of the Freneh court with the refined knowledge of a country peculiarly diſtinguiſhed by literature, became the ſocial friend of Franklin; his unaffected manners his ſenſible gracefulneſs, had obtained a ſort of influence over the French miniſter, that he acted as if he were aſhamed to purſue with the American the wily inſincerity practiſed with courtiers. The modern diplomatic character is the narroweſt ſphere of ſociety in which a man of principle can be placed; recognized only as a ſpy, and known to be generally ſelected from men deſtitute of moral integrity, their preſence forbids intercourſe by a reciprocity of ſuſpicion. But Franklin by plain manners and an utter contempt for affectation overturned all theſe obſtacles, and inſtead of being conſidered as ambaſſadors uſually deſerve to be, he was eſteemed as a new and different character, and his circle of ſociety became as extenſive as he could deſire, and circumſcribed only by his avocations and by want of adequate leiſure.—

Under ſuch fortunate auſpices, the principal difficulties to a negociation were eaſily removed, and after a ſhort reſidence, an alliance was formed, which was of more advantage to American independence than an army of 30,000 men at the ſame period. This negociation produced two treaties, one of which was wholly amicable and commercial, the other eventual and defenſive; both were executed with general ſatisfaction in Paris, on the ſixth day of February, 1778.

The examination of theſe treaties, and of all the other circumſtances under which they were formed, preſents an example of generoſity in political tranſactions that is at once as extraordinary as it is rare and honourable to the negociators and the nations concluded in it. They exhibit the firſt evidence of philoſophy in modern times, blending true liberality with diplomatic proceedings. The commercial treaty declared that the baſis of the agreement ſhould be "The moſt perfect equality and reciprocity, and by carefully "avoiding all thoſe burthenſome preferences which are uſually ſources of debate, em- "barraſſment and diſcontent; by leaving each party at liberty to make, reſpecting "navigation and commerce, ſuch interior regulations as ſhould be found moſt convenient "to itſelf, and by founding the advantage of commerce ſolely upon reciprocal utility, "and the ſtrict rules of free intercourſe; reſerving withal to each party the liberty of "admitting at its pleaſure other nations to a participation of the ſame advantages." By the ſecond article of the ſame treaty it was ſtipulated, that the parties "ſhould not "grant any particular favour to other nations, in reſpect to commerce and navigation, "which ſhall not immediately become common to the other party, who ſhall enjoy the "ſame favour freely, if the conceſſion was freely made, or on allowing the ſame com- "penſation if the conceſſion was conditional."

The ſame treaty provides by the ſucceeding articles for mutual immunities in their ports, and for reciprocal convoys of their ſhips at ſea; for the interpoſition of the French government with the powers of Barbary to protect American commerce; for the exemption of Americans from the Droit d'Aubaine in France; and concerning the mode of treatment on the ſtoppage of veſſels of either power, ſuſpected of carrying contraband goods. By the 17th article it is ſtipulated that "It ſhall be lawful for the ſhips of war "of either party, and privateers, freely to carry wherever they pleaſe the ſhips and goods "taken from their enemies, without being obliged to pay any duties to the officers of "the admiralty or any other judges; nor ſhall ſuch prizes be arreſted or ſeized when "they come to or enter the port of either party; nor ſhall the ſearchers or other "officers of thoſe places ſearch the ſame, or make examination concerning the lawful- "neſs of ſuch prizes; but they may hoiſt ſail at any time, and depart and carry their "prizes to the places expreſſed in their commiſſions, which the commanders of ſuch "ſhips of war ſhall be obliged to ſhew: On the contrary, no refuge or ſhelter ſhall be "given in their ports to ſuch as ſhall have made prizes of the ſubjects of either party; "but if ſuch ſhall come in, being forced by ſtreſs of weather, or the danger of the "ſea, all proper means ſhall be rigorouſly uſed that they go out and retire from thence "as ſoon as poſſible." The 21ſt article declares that perſons of either nation taking out commiſſions from any third power at war with either of them, to take a part in hoſtilities againſt either of the allied ſtates, in favour of ſuch third ſtate, ſhall be puniſhed as a pirate. The 23d article prohibits the ſale of any veſſel or goods taken from either of the parties being ſold or exchanged in the ports of one or the other. The 24th article declares that the people of each nation may fail with full ſecurity, and carrying all manner of merchandize to any port or place, even belonging to a nation at enmity with the other, making in all caſes the goods free on board the neutral ſhips of the contracting parties, actual contraband only excepted; and the ſame freedom is extended to perſons on board the ſhip of either nation when neutral, notwithſtanding ſuch perſons may actually be the enemy of the other party, ſoldiers in actual ſervice only excepted. The 25th article deſcribes what ſhall and ſhall not be deemed contraband; among the former only are comprehended all actual warlike ſtores; and among the articles exempted are "all ſorts of clothes, and other manufactures of wool, flax, ſilk, "cotton, gold and ſilver coined and uncoined, tin, iron, latten, copper, braſs, coals; "as alſo wheat, barley, and other kinds of corn or pulſe; tobacco, and all manner of "ſpices, ſalted and ſmoked fiſh, cheeſe and butter, beer, wines, oils, ſugars, and all "ſorts of ſalts, and in general all proviſions which ſerve for the nouriſhment of life; "furthermore all kinds of cotton, hemp, flax, tar, pitch, ropes, cables, ſails, ſail-"cloth, anchors, and any part of anchors, alſo ſhips maſts, planks, boards, and "beams of what trees ſoever, and other materials proper for building or repairing "ſhips," and all other things not therein ſpecified, which have not been worked up into any inſtrument or weapon for war by ſea or land and reputed contraband; to be carried to all places at all times excepting only "places belonging to an enemy which are be-"ſieged, blockaded, or inveſted." The 25th article concerns ſea-letters, or the role d'equipage, which are ſtipulated to be recalled every year. The 29th article ſtipulates the "mutual liberty of having in the ports of each other conſuls, vice conſuls, "agents, and commiſſaries, whoſe functions ſhall be regulated by a particular agree-"ment."

The treaty of defenſive alliance, after the uſual preliminaries, in the ſecond article ſtates, "That the eſſential and direct end of the preſent defenſive alliance, is to main-"tain effectually the liberty, ſovereignty, and independency, abſolute and unlimited of "the ſaid United States, as well in matters of government as of commerce." The fifth provides "That in caſe the Bermudas ſhould be conquered, they ſhould become "incorporated with or dependent on the United States." By the ſixth the poſſeſſions to which France might have a preſumptive claim on account of poſſeſſion before the peace of 1763 in all parts of North America are renounced. By the eleventh the two parties "mutually guarantee from the preſent time and for ever, againſt all other powers, to "wit the United States, the preſent poſſeſſions of France in America, as well as thoſe "which may be acquired by a future treaty of peace," and on the part of France the "liberty, ſovereignty, and independence," in government and commerce and all additions or conqueſts made by the confederation during the war, "to be fixed and aſſured "to the ſaid ſtates at the moment of the ceſſation of the war with England." The twelfth article declares—"That in order to fix more preciſely the ſenſe and application of the "preceding article, the contracting parties declare, that in caſe of a rupture between "France and England, the reciprocal guarantee declared in the ſaid article ſhall have its "full force and effect, the moment ſuch war ſhall break out; and if ſuch war ſhall not "take place, the mutual obligations of the ſaid guarantee ſhall not commence until the "moment of the ceſſation of the preſent war between the United States and England, "ſhall have aſcertained their poſſeſſions."

Theſe are the leading and moſt eſſential features of the two treaties with France of 1778. It would be ſuperfluous to detail the particular length which France went to in ſupport of her engagements, or to eſtimate the momentum of her power in producing or accelerating that part of the guarantee which ſhe had bound herſelf to perform. Perhaps it is from the enemies of both countries the beſt evidence on this point is to be derived. It is, however, clear that France in forming theſe treaties had neither taken advantage of the circumſtances in which ſhe herſelf ſtood, of the exigency under which the ſoliciting party was placed, nor of any proviſion for a contingency either in point of expenditure or future remuneration of any kind.

The whole appears rather as the ſacrifices of an affectionate friendſhip than the cold ſtipulations of a ſelfiſh diplomacy; it was the emanation of the ſpirit of the characters and circumſtances that produced it. To America there was a direct, immediate, and ſtupendous good, in return for which France was to be entitled for a remote and circumſcribed advantage; a privilege which could not be conſidered as an equivalent excluſive of the remoteneſs. This privilege was ſuch as priority of engagements and benefits might have produced without regard to the magnitude of the favors; ſince the advantage was to be in fact mutual. This was in the privileges allowed by the ſeventeenth article above ſtated, of paſſing their ſhips of war and prizes into the ports of the United States during a future poſſible war, without the officers of the United States taking cognizance of the validity or invalidity of the capture, and without exacting any duty or making any ſearch; and at the ſame time excluding the enemies of France from a ſimilar privilege. At the period of the treaty this ſtipulation could be of no advantage to France, as the ſtrength of America was not ſuch as to make good the guarantee on her part in the firſt inſtance, and the prize privilege of neceſſity was for that war nugatory, both parties being ſoon after engaged in it.

A ſpirit of faction and intrigue had prevailed to an immenſe extent, during the revolution, but it had been concealed with laudable addreſs from public obſervation; men who had embar ed from an inevitable neceſſity or from ambition in the general revolt, ſaw that America at worſt could only be reduced to her colonial condition by defeat, and that in the event of her triumph, they ſhould ſtand a fair chance for rank and conſequence in the American nation; encouraged by the ſucceſs of the public cauſe, they extended their views and cheriſhed hopes of ambition. As more recently in the French revolution all parties were united while there was danger to be apprehended from the predominant power of the king, ſo the moment that the danger was removed by his fall the ſpirit of faction was diſplayed, and a ſtruggle was exhibited wherein the only true queſtion was which party ſhould poſſeſs power. In America the paſſions of faction did not proceed to ſuch extremes, they were reſtrained by internal weakneſs, by the remoteneſs of the legiſlative members from each other, and by the well known fact that the number of royaliſts in the United States was conſiderable enough to be dangerous, ſhould congreſs be divided. The efforts of private ambition were thus confined to the creation of parties under one or another leader, or to the acquiſition of particular men to one or another ſide. It is well known, however, that during the revolution, men the moſt diſtinguiſhed have been retained in the firſt places of truſt only by the ſucceſs of one party, in a political intrigue. Such occurrences are perhaps inſeparable from the nature of man in ſociety, it is only their conſequences which ſhould be conſidered, in order that men by guarding againſt remote or apparently trivial evils may prevent them from ſwelling into afflictions, fatal to a nation through all poſterity.

The negociations at Paris in 1783, like the fall of the monarch in ten years after, gave the ſignal for party conteſt, and the annals of America exhibit the phenomenon in politics of her miniſters at the cloſe of their country's triumph, engaged in a clandeſtine correſpondence and defaming their fellow miniſter, to ſecure to themſelves the reputation of having accompliſhed what the character of Franklin only could have ever obtained. Hiſtory, which diſclaims all bias and which owes every tribute to the memory of the glorious dead, will not ſtoop to name thoſe who were the defamers of Franklin, on that occaſion. But it is connected with the preſent ſtate of America to ſtate the facts, for at that period was laid the foundation of thoſe dangers which now threaten America, and which, if not averted by the public voice, will entail on poſterity all thoſe afflictions with which war, ambition, and national hatreds have curſed nations.

In the ſecret proceedings of party in America ſince the period of 1783, little has been publicly diſplayed; but in private and in the meaſures propoſed from time to time, in the convention of 1787, and from thence to this day, the ſame undeviating pertinacity, the ſame inflexible avidity, the ſame machiavelian ſyſtem of political duplicity, have been gradually ſapping the foundations of American liberty; under every acceſſible form has the republican government been aſſailed, and even in adminiſtering to her afflictions ſhe has been ſtabbed in the vitals by the very hands ſucceſſively appointed to heal her wounds.

The efforts that were made to reduce the United States to a monarchy, were barely unſucceſsful. It was to public opinion only that the failure can be with juſtice attributed; for it has been acknowledged on all hands, that thoſe who propoſed a monarchical form were much more alert than the friends of an equal repreſentative government.

The French revolution opened new objects of hope and of fear. Ambition alternately panted and trembled. The enormities fomented by the common enemy of France and America, the cruelties of a few monſters in France, that like Arnold or Kirke, would deluge their country with their kindred blood,* ſoon preſented occaſions to the enemies of freedom which their hopes had never anticipated to gratify ambition. Under the colour of the ruin that had deſolated France, freedom itſelf was diſparaged of its bleſſings, and republican government was traduced; becauſe a nation attacked by all Europe, diſtracted by faction, and expoſed to hired aſſaſſination, had been deluged with blood. But it was not theſe horrors that alarmed men adverſe to free government, it was the dangers to which ambition was expoſed by the prevalence of thoſe equal principles which France had borrowed from America and enlarged and promulged as the common right of mankind.

That ſuch diſpoſitions prevailed in America required the moſt ſullen incredulity to doubt. It has been manifeſted in a thouſand ſhapes, and every day's progreſſive acts diſplays it in tenfold deformity.

An Engliſh writer in diſcuſſing the current hiſtory of the year 1796, † ſays—"While France by the ſucceſs of her arms was leſſening the number of her enemies in Europe, ſhe found her influence decreaſing in the United States of America. Though little was to have been expected from national gratitude, it was ſuppoſed that national honor would have prevented the American government from ſeizing the opportunity when the French republic was ſtruggling for her political exiſtence, to throw herſelf into the arms of her moſt potent enemy. It was therefore with equal ſurprize and indignation that the French government heard of the concluſion of the treaty formed by Mr. Jay between that country and England, the tenor of which was ſo evidently in oppoſition to treaties already exiſting between America and France, that it was concluded that an open breach between the two countries muſt have been the immediate conſequence."

* See one Arnold's public addreſs after his treachery.
† New Annual Regiſter printed at London for 1796.

When ſuch is the opinion entertained of the conduct of our government in the eyes of that nation favored by its partiality, what muſt be the reflections of the diſpaſſionate American? But we ſhall continue the hiſtory from this Engliſh authority and ſubjoin ſuch illuſtrations as have either paſſed over unnoticed, or were unknown to the writer.

"For ſome time paſt the conduct of the American adminiſtration had towards the (French) republic been diſtant and ceremonious; nor did the recal and diſgrace of Genet, the French ambaſſador, whoſe perſonal altercations with the preſident had led the French government to make this ſolemn act of reparation, effect any changes in its favor. There is no doubt but the conduct of Genet was contrary to that ſpirit of moderation which a perſon in his official ſtation ought to have obſerved; but the peculiar ſituation of the French republic ſhould have led the American government to have made great allowances, eſpecially when the ſyſtem of the propaganda which it was ſaid to have been attempted to be introduced into America, by order of the committee of the revolutionary regime, had been formally diſclaimed by thoſe who afterwards held the reins of the French government.

"A momentary gleam of reconcilement had been thrown acroſs the ſhade of diſcontent, by the arrival of a new ambaſſador, Mr. Monroe, from America; whoſe political principles were known to be exactly oppoſite to thoſe of his predeceſſor Mr. Morris; and the language of fraternity and congratulation was once more heard at the bar of the national convention.

"The negociation for a treaty with England, taught the French what value they were to fix on theſe new profeſſions of national amity, and what confidence was to be repoſed in the benevolence of a government, the ſtandard of whoſe attachment, it was ſaid was to be known only by that of its avarice. The treaty itſelf was leſs heeded in France than the diſpoſitions which led to its formation. It was obſerved that certain articles in this treaty not only infringed on the one concluded between the United States and the French nation, in 1778, but were direct violations of it. In that treaty, for inſtance, the United States formally guaranteed to the French their colonies in the Weſt-Indies in caſe of attack; in the preſent, even ſupplies ſent to theſe colonies are ſtated to be illegal commerce: It was expected that a treaty ſo hoſtile to the intereſt of France, and ſo contrary to that ſpirit of neutrality which was the obvious intereſt of the American government to obſerve, would not have been ſanctioned by the American legiſlature, Notwithſtanding the predominancy of the Engliſh influence in the (American) Senate, and the diſfavour of the preſident towards French principles, were well underſtood to exiſt, yet it was ſuppoſed that the change which had taken place in the ſituation of France, and that of Europe ſince the negociation had been opened, would have led the American legiſlature to refuſe its ratification. But although it was evident from the deciſion of Congreſs, what was the general ſentiment of the people in America reſpecting this treaty, the French government heard with indignation of this legalized preference shewn to the Engliſh intereſt.

" An intercepted letter from the préſident of the United States, addreſſed to Mr. (Governeur) Morris, who had been lately the American ambaſſador in France, and who then officiated as the ſecret agent of the American government of the United States in London, had already diſcovered to the directory the hoſtile views of the government of the United States. This letter dated from Philadelphia, the 21ſt of December, 1795, was a detailed anſwer to various letters of Mr. Morris reſpecting the pending negociation. The preſident complained highly of the haughty conduct of the Engliſh adminiſtration, and of the arbitrary meaſures which they had purſued, and which they were continuing to purſue, with reſpect to the American navigation. He requeſted Mr. Morris to repreſent to the miniſter not only the injuſtice, but the impolicy of this conduct, particularly at a time when it was ſo much the intereſt of England to conciliate the minds of the inhabitants of the United States to the acceptance of the treaty. He detailed the efforts he had made, and the difficulties he had undergone, to overcome the wayward diſpoſition of his countrymen towards French politics, the abettors of which were the chief opponents of the treaty in queſtion; which, however, he ſaid, had the approbation and ſanction of the greater and more reſpectable part of the community. His main object, preſident Waſhington obſerved,—the only object which ought to be kept in view, was peace, which he was moſt anxious to preſerve, and if America was happy enough to keep herſelf out of European quarrels, ſhe might from the increaſe of her trade, from ſecuring the monopoly of being the carrier of the world, vie in twenty years with the moſt formidable powers of the earth.

" This letter ſaved from the wreck of the Boſton packet, which foundered on the coaſt of France, was conſidered as deciſive evidence of the diſpoſitions of the American government towards the French republic; of the intrigues carried on with the Engliſh; and naturally awakened thoſe feelings of reſentment which naturally ariſe from a ſenſe of injury heightened by ingratitude; and excited alſo a deſire of diſplaying that reſentment. Various were the repreſentations made to the executive power of France to calm the indignation which theſe provocations had raiſed. It was alleged on the one hand, that the attempts made by the late committees of government to revolutionize America, had not been forgotten; that the Engliſh party taking advantage of the imprudence of the agents of the French republic, had acquired an undue preponderance in the counſels of the executive power of the United States; that this alienation was only temporary, ariſing on the one hand from the dread of the Engliſh, and on the other, from the powerleſs ſtate of the French republic at that period; from whom they could in caſe of need hope for no aſſiſtance; that it would be very probable the ratification of the treaty would be refuſed by the congreſs; and that the general diſlike of the inhabitants of the United States to any ſerious connection with the Engliſh government, was a decided fact, whatever might be the diſpoſition of the executive power; that a declaration of hoſtilities againſt the United States would be detrimental to the cauſe of the republic, by leſſening the number of its friends; and that it was probable the enſuing election for the preſidentſhip would produce ſuch changes in American politics as might prove more beneficial to the intereſts of France than the moſt brilliant and decided ſucceſs of her armies. Theſe and other repreſentations counteracted the effects of the diſcovery made by the preſident's letter. The directory determined on continuing the ſemblance of friendſhip with the United States, and contented itſelf with following the ſame conduct with reſpect to their veſſels as England had obſerved throughout the war."

It is not in all caſes that Engliſh authority can be ſafely relied upon, and eſpecially in ſuch as particularly concern the intereſts or the power of that country. But when in matters where that intereſt is involved, and the liberality of the writer is ſuch as to produce circumſtances which appear to militate with the national prejudices, the authority may be at leaſt received with as much credit as is due to regular hiſtory. According to this Engliſh writer, then the American character merits the ſtigma of a breach of national faith, and by the manner in which it is publiſhed the imputation is not confined to a few individuals, to a branch of the government, but to all the nation.

This ſtatement is evidently deficient of thoſe minuter facts which local circumſtances alone could furniſh. It is proper then, after giving the ſentiments which are now become hiſtory in a great part of Europe, from the popularity of the medium through which they are publiſhed, to advert to ſuch facts as are neceſſary to illucidate the events which have led to the preſent national dilemma.

By what has been before obſerved, it was our apparent opinion that the prevalence of a party in the United States; a party formed in the moment that independence was eſtabliſhed, had contributed to produce the unfortunate circumſtances in which the United States have been placed. An examination of early events will further illuſtrate this opinion.

The French nation had not yet conſtituted its frame of government, after having decided upon the formation of a republic, when the miniſter Ternaut, then at Philadelphia, was directed to communicate the event to the American government, which was done by a letter of date the ſixth of February, 1793, delivered on the thirteenth of that month. The American ſecretary of ſtate replied on the twenty-third, by a cordial letter, reciprocatingaſſurances of good will in the name of the executive.

On the eighth of April following, a new miniſter, Genet, arrived at Charleſton, South Carolina, where he was received with the loudeſt acclamations and congratulations. In ten days after his arrival at Charleſton, on the eighteenth of April, a ſeries of thirteen queſtions were propounded by the preſident to the heads of departments, requeſting them to come prepared with advice on a ſubſequent day on each of theſe queſtions. It will be obſerved that the Engliſh government had commenced depredations on France in the latter end of the year 1792, and had by a meaſure unauthoriſed by law detained ſeveral neutral veſſels bound to France with grain; early in 1793 ſhe had diſmiſſed the French miniſter Chauvelin, which according to a treaty between France and England of 1786, was agreed to be tantamount to a declaration of war. In February, 1793, France, in return, formally declared war againſt England, on account of this and various other aggreſſions. The queſtions above mentioned were framed in conſequence of this event. The firſt—"Shall a proclamation be iſſued for the purpoſe of preventing the interference of the citizens of the United States, in the war between France and Great Britain, &c? Shall it contain a declaration of neutrality or not? What ſhall it contain?—Second, Shall a miniſter from the republic of France be received?—Third, If received, ſhall it be abſolute, or with qualifications; and if with qualifications, of what kind?—Fourth, Are the United States obliged by good faith to conſider the treaties heretofore made with France, as applying to the preſent ſituation of the parties? May they renounce them, or hold them ſuſpended 'till the government of France ſhall be eſtabliſhed?—Fifth, If they have the right, is it expedient to do either and which?--If they have an option, would it be a breach of neutrality to conſider the treaty ſtill in operation?--Seventh, If the treaties are to be conſidered as now in operation, is the guarantee in the treaty of alliance applicable to a defenſive war only, or to a war either offenſive or defenſive?--Eighth, Does the war in which France is engaged appear to be offenſive or defenſive on her part? Or of a mixed and equivocal character?—Ninth, If of a mixed and equivocal character; does the guarantee in any event apply to ſuch a war?—Tenth, What is the effect of a guarantee, ſuch as that to be found in the treaty of alliance between the United States and France?—Eleventh, Does any article in either of the treaties prevent ſhips of war, other than privateers, of the powers oppoſed to France, from coming into the ports of the United States, to act as convoys to their own merchantmen? Or does it lay other reſtraint upon them more than would apply to the ſhips of war of France?—Twelfth, Should the future regent of France ſend a miniſter to the United States, ought he to be received?—Thirteenth, Is it neceſſary or adviſable to call together the two houſes of Congreſs, with a view to the preſent poſture of European affairs? If it is, what ſhould be the particular objects of ſuch a call?"

The 2d, 3d, 4th and 12th of theſe queſtions are the moſt remarkable, but each and every one of them diſplay a diſpoſition which it is difficult to deſcribe. The very firſt of them went to deſtroy the good faith of the American nation. For upon no other ground than that of utter ignorance, or decided partiality, could a doubt be entertained on the ſubject by any perſon acquainted with the laws of nations and the force of treaties. The 4th article is precifely in the ſame predicament, only that the ignorance or the diſregard of the law of nations and treaties is leſs equivocal. The 11th article exhibits the drift and intention of the whole, and clearly ſhews the diſpoſition to evade the ſtipulations of the French treaties, to afford advantages in oppoſition to it to the Engliſh merchants ſettled in the United States. In ſuch a diſpoſition, unconnected with the pre-exiſting circumſtances there could not be any thing improper, it would rather be the duty and intereſt of the government to provide for the protection of its commerce. But ſo long as the national honor is of value, ſo long as treaties are the pledges of that honor, the attempt to evade them is a degradation of the national character and a violation of national faith. It is pertinent to obſerve, that at the very period when theſe queſtions were propounded, Talon, an agent of the emigrant princes was at Philadelphia, and conſtantly at the preſident's levee.

From the ſubſequent conduct of the executive it is ſufficientlyclear what was the determination taken on theſe queſtions reſpectively. Let us enquire what was the conduct of France. Preciſely two days after the iſſue of thoſe queſtions by the American executive, the French convention on the 20th of February, paſſed a decree in the following terms—1ſt, "That the ports of the French colonies are open to the United States of America. 4d, That all merchandibe exported or imported by American veſſels, ſhall pay at their coming in or going out of the above ports no higher duties than are paid by French veſſels. 3d, The executive council is authoriſed to take ſuch meaſures as may prevent ſuch nations as are at war with the republic from availing themſelves of ſuch advantages as are only granted to friendly powers. 4th, The executive council ſhall negociate with the United States to obtain a ſimilar reduction of duties which is granted by the preſent law to American traders, and to draw cloſer the ties of benevolence between the two nations."

Meanwhile, in two days after the date of this French decree, in four days after the date of the queſtions, and in fourteen days only after the arrival of the new miniſter of the republic at Charleſton, on the 22d of April, the American preſident iſſued a proclamation of neutrality. Upon the ſubſtance of this document there can be little urged, it is in itſelf too ſevere a ſatire on the government. The queſtion of its conſtitutionality belongs not to this hiſtory. But the diſpoſition that dictated it, and the latent principle upon which it was predicated, were in direct oppoſition to the obligations of treaties, and contrary to thoſe common principles of liberality which entitle men to a return for good offices conferred in critical circumſtances. Theſe truths are incontrovertible. It will always be allowed, that wiſdom and prudence dictated the maintenance of a faithful neutrality on the part of the United States, a neutrality neceſſary to her infant eſtabliſhment and her growing proſperity. And we ſhall find that her ally was as ſenſible of the neceſſity of this prudential courſe of proceeding, as the government of America could be. The French miniſter, Genet, after ſtaying a ſhort time in the Southern ſtates, arrived in Philadelphia on the ſixteenth of May, thirty-eight days after his landing; he was received through all the country on his journey with congratulations, and in the capital particularly with unuſual attachment and reſpect. In an extempore ſpeech delivered in the Engliſh language, he expreſſed among others the following ſentiments—"France is ſurrounded with difficulties, but her cauſe is the cauſe of mankind, and muſt prevail. With reſpect to you, American citizens, I will declare openly and freely, for the miniſters of a republic ſhould have no ſecrets, no intrigues, that from the remote ſituation of America and other circumſtances, ſhe does not expect that America ſhould become a party in the war; but remembering that ſhe has already combated for your liberties, and if it was neceſſary, would chearfully again enliſt in your cauſe, we hope, and every thing I hear and ſee aſſures me our hope will be realized, that her citizens will be treated as brothers in danger and diſtreſs."

The Engliſh writer, quoted above, has urged ſome alleged miſconduct of the French miniſter towards the American executive; it will be uſeful to examine into the ſource of this cauſe of complaint. Upon the arrival of the French miniſter at Charleſton, a number of perſons attached from principle to the republic, had applied for commiſſions to fit out privateers, and he had granted them. Unqueſtionably this conduct of the citizens of the United States was contrary to the obligations of actual neutrality, inſomuch as the fitting out of ſhips in the United States, and cruiſing thence, might be ſet up as a cauſe of war by the power affected thereby. How far it was a breach of neutrality on the part of the French miniſter is not ſo clear. But admitting it to have been even an abſolute voluntary act of the miniſter, he had before him the precedent eſtabliſhed by the American miniſters in France and Holland during the revolution, and prior to any alliance between France and the United States. The parity of the caſes at leaſt exempted the French miniſter from any opprobrium, which, if it could at all be applied, became common to America. This meaſure, however, was ſet up by the American executive as a cauſe of offence, and a breach of that neutrality which had been declared by the proclamation of the twenty-ſecond of April.

It will be neceſſary in this place to advert to the ſtate of party in America at this period. The moderation of Dr. Franklin had diſarmed faction of its turbulence after his return to America from Europe; he relied upon the ſlow but ſteady operation of knowlege on mankind, to overcome the viſible efforts of private ambition; pleaſed with the eſtabliſhment of a conſtitution in America, which, though it was not wholly entitled to his admiration, was yet preferable to any hereditary eſtabliſhment; the ſame quieſcent ſecurity pervaded all the republicans. Their rivals, who were declared advocates of the monarchial inſtitution in one ſhape or another, could not place the ſame reliance on the progreſſion of literature for the realization of their deſires. America now exhibited the reverſe of that picture which it preſented a few years before. The republicans from vigilance and activity became paſſive, and the monarchiſts redoubled their exertions. It has been alleged a reſpectable man, who was a member of the celebrated congreſs at Albany, that before preſenting the ſketch of a republican conſtitution there, Mr. John Jay obſerved to ſome of his colleagues that that conſtitution might anſwer very well for a while, but that we muſt at length have a monarchy. Mr. Jay was one of the miniſters who negociated with Dr. Franklin the treaty of 1783. The other was Mr. John Adams, it is unneceſſary to cite any other authority for the attachment of this gentleman to the monarchical form of government, than his work called a defence of the conſtitutions of the United States. Theſe two gentlemen were the great leaders of the now active party, and both were ſucceſſively appointed to places of the firſt conſequence under the conſtitution. There were other characters, however, not leſs active though more or leſs conſpicious than theſe. The character of general Waſhington as a politician has not been generally underſtood in any enlarged degree. Reſerved in his demeanor and cold in his regards, with an impoſing perſon and placed by a happy fortune at the head of a nation, his auſterity was conſidered as the common effect of exalted ſituation. His political opinions have never been ſo explicitely declared as to commit his judgment, and it is poſſible that his military and conſtitutional habits have dictated this ſilence, while a free or a mixed government would probably be alike acceptable to him. Upon his political conduct in the tranſactions with France, however, his uſual prudence was overcome by the very nature of the circumſtances, and by the active preſſure of the party who had cluſtered round him as the centre of their ſecret hopes. The preſident had attachments, though they were few. Unfortunately for his reputation, his choice of perſons for places of truſt, and his particular confidence, was not always conſiſtent either with the freedom of his country nor the reputed ſtrictneſs of his own private character. His principal adviſer at this critical period, was a man diſtinguiſhed for his private debauchery and his avowed attachment to monarchical government; the departments of the government were filled with men of talents, and the department of ſtate particularly had at its head a man of acknowleged integrity and of a capacity unrivalled in literary acquirements and diplomatic knowlege But the head of the financial department, Mr. Alexander Hamilton, was the ſecret adviſer of the American preſident. He was the author of thoſe queſtions which gave the firſt fatal indication of a ſlackneſs of regard for the national character. Some very obſcure men, remarkable for no one faculty of genius or talent, unexperienced in the knowledge of the world, were the ſubaltern agents of this party, and the whole were united in a common league, though each had ſeparate and even oppoſite views, in leading the government and people of America into a new channel of politics ſuitable to their private principles and deſigns.

Having produced by their advice the queries and the proclamation, Genet on the 23d of May 1793, ſtill confiding in the demonſtrations of public attachment he had received, addreſſed the American government, notifying that he was empowered to renew exiſting treaties. He was informed, that the Senate not being in ſeſſion the preſident could not according to the conſtitution enter on the ſubject deſired. Meanwhile ſeveral of thoſe veſſels which had taken commiſſions from Genet had ſailed, and others were by authority of government detained. The detention of veſſels belonging to American citizens fitted out in America for the ſervice of France was no doubt perfectly prudent and wiſe; but it was alledged, and it was alſo proved, that ſeveral veſſels had ſailed from American ports belonging to England, armed and equipped in ports of the United States. On the 4th of Auguſt 1793, a letter was addreſſed by the American ſecretary of the treaſury to the collectors of the cuſtoms accompanied by regulations prohibiting all military equipments in favor of either of the belligerent powers. They were immediately carried into effect as laws, and even extended to armed veſſels and prizes which had been brought in before that period. But even before this, according to a letter of the ſecretary of ſtate of the 22d of June, the tribunals of juſtice had, by order of government, actually aſſumed the cognizance of prize cauſes. This mode of proceeding was directly hoſtile to the 17th article of the treaty of amity and commerce with France, above quoted; and in open violation of the ſecond ſection of the ſixth article of the conſtitution of the United States. So conſcious was the executive of this, that he afterwards made a formal application to Congreſs on the 3d of December 1793, for a law to ſanction this very breach of the treaty. Congreſs paſſed ſuch a law on the 5th of June 1794! On the meſſage itſelf comment would be ſuperfluous, ſince it contained only expreſſions calculated to juſtify what had been already done, but one expreſſion deſerves particular notice—"Where individuals "within the United States &c. ſhall uſurp and exerciſe judicial authority &c. there offences "cannot receive too early and cloſe an attention, and require prompt and deciſive "remedies. Whatever theſe remedies may be they will be well adminiſtered by the judi- "ciary, who poſſeſs a long eſtabliſhed courſe of inveſtigation, effectual proceſs, and officers in "the habit of executing it." It requires only a peruſal of the 17th article of the treaty to perceive the wilful violation of the treaty in the very phraeſology of this recommendation, and at the ſame time the inexpiable indecency of the manner in which it was done. Treaties were expreſsly acknowled to be the ſupreme law where they have been formally and legally contracted, and it was as well underſtood that they are binding until formally relinquiſhed by either of the parties, or regulated or qualified by other treaties. No ſuch relinquiſhment or qualification took place, nay five ſeveral overtures made by the French government for a negociation were actually rejected, under forms of evaſion, if not impolitic at leaſt conferring no honor on the American government. The 17th article of a ſolemn treaty veſted in the hands of the French conſuls ſolely and excluſively the juriſdiction over prizes, and the American government was abſolutely and bona fide bound not to interfere with or to arreſt even any of the officers or prizes, nor to ſearch nor to reſtrain them but to permit them to paſs inward and to depart from the ports of America at diſcretion. Yet notwithſtanding this previous practice and the law, the preſident on the 21ſt of June and 3d of July 1794, decided two caſes of capture without a reference to the law. There were a multitude of corelative circumſtances that rendered this breach of public faith ſtill more ſtriking; the public partiality of America exonerated the preſident from the odium, by transferring it to ſecretary Hamilton, but the act of congreſs and ſubſequent meaſures have placed the ſtigma indelibly upon the government.

In the progreſs of ſuch tranſactions it can be no longer a matter of ſurpriſe if the agent of the injured nation ſhould feel for the honor and rights appertaining to his country by the moſt ſolemn contracts.

Several veſſels of war belonging to the king of England and to private Engliſh adventurers, actually entered the roads and ports of America, with their prizes, contrary to the ſame treaty, and at the ſame periods.

Meanwhile thoſe perſons, who, from their averſion to the French revolution and their political attachments, may be called the monarchical, in contradiſtinction from thoſe who were of different ſentiments, having effected their object in placing a local and internal law of one nation above the contract ſolemnly entered into by two, and in which the rights of the injured nation were done away; their next object now was the villification of the miniſter and afterwards the nation itſelf. The tranſactions in France between January and June, 1793, might have eaſily deceived men of no great depth of judgement, or who were willing to liſten to the flattering viſions of their prejudices; it was not ſurpriſing that ſuch men ſhould, according to their limited calculations, conclude that the diſtractions in that country and the external combination of all Europe preſented difficulties too great for the nation to oppoſe or ſurmount. To theſe perſons the eſtabliſhment of a republic in France was the moſt formidable of all political occurrences, it went to batter down the theories which they had ſupported during their whole lives; the proſpect of its ſubjugation was the proſpect of a revived hope and a future triumph; it was anticipated with an elation bordering on tranſport, and the avidity with which every meaſure that would accelerate the cataſtrophe was countenanced, diſplayed the diſpoſitions of the men in colours too diſcriminate to be miſtaken.

The miniſter ſtationed by America in France at this period, was exactly a man ſuitable to the diſpoſition of the active party. Mr. Gouverneur Morris, had diſtinguiſhed himſelf in public life as the open and decided enemy of the American revolution, he had as a ſenator, and in private life, uniformly ſupported monarchical principles, and in point of morals the ſecretary of the treaſury would have bluſhed at the compariſon. Such was the man appointed by republican America as its repreſentative among the moſt intelligent people in Europe. The conduct of this miniſter in France was conſiſtent with his character at home, and he became ſo openly the illicit agent of England, that he eſcaped the puniſhment inflicted on ſpies, only from a reverence for his character as an ambaſſador; he was obliged to leave France for his intrigues, and he became ſoon after the open agent of the Engliſh miniſter on the continent of Europe. The letter of General Waſhington to this miniſter has been already noticed, and its effects on the French government, until a new miniſter was appointed.

Meanwhile having committed an injuſtice againſt France, it became neceſſary to diſcredit her miniſter. Mr. John Jay and Mr. Rufus King, the one chief Juſtice of the United States and the other a ſenator, publicly and explicitly accuſed the miniſter Genet of having "intimated to General Waſhington an intention of appealing to the people of America" on the ſubject of his conduct towards France. Whether ſuch an appeal would not be in itſelf ſtrictly correct remained to be ſhewn, as the only ordinary and apparent courſe of complaint is from the offended individual to the ſovereign againſt the acts really or ſuppoſedly wrong of that ſovereign's ſervants. This charge, however, was calculated to produce too ends, it was a trial of the diſpoſition of the people of America to change the order of the American ſyſtem of government, and place the ſovereignty of the nation in the executive, inſtead of the people with whom it is declared to reſt by the conſtitution. The other object was through the popularity of General Waſhington to excite a jealouſy or hatred of republican France. Genet ſaw through theſe ſtratagems, and by a letter of the 10th of Auguſt 1793, addreſſed to General Waſhington, called upon him from mere motives of candour and probity to make an explicit declaration concerning the allegation of Meſſieurs Jay and King; urging that the anſwer from him would bepubliſhed as the only reply to the calumny "of thoſe party men who never fail to confound the individual with affairs of ſtate." In this letter Genet ſtates "To you alone I have declared that the Fe"deral government, far from manifeſting any regard for our generous conduct towards "this country—for the new advantages which we were offering to her commerce—or for

"the reiterated demonſtrations of our real and diſtintereſted friendſhip, were ſacrificing
"our intereſts to thoſe of our enemies, by their interpretation of the treaties which exiſt
"between us." Theſe ſentiments were undoubtedly ſtrong, and if there is a ſanctity attached to magiſtrates which forbids the aſſertion of truth in any given caſe, no offence could be more flagrant becauſe no facts were leſs queſtionable.

The anſwer returned to this letter was dated on the 16th of Auguſt, through the medium of the ſecretary of ſtate, and contained theſe remarkable expreſſions—"The "preſident does not conceive it to be within the line of propriety or duty for him to bear "evidence againſt a declaration, which, whether made to him or others, is perhaps im-
"material; he therefore declines interfering in the caſe." Genet, however, publicly declared the aſſertions of Meſſieurs Jay and King to be totally and explicitly falſe, and he endeavoured to proſecute them for a libel; but the American executive had applied to the French government, and Genet was recalled. Prior to his recall, however, Duplaine the French conſul at Boſton, acting under the treaty that ſubſiſted between the two nations, prevented the interference of a municipal officer with the concerns of a prize brought into that harbor and placed under his protection. A proſecution was inſtituted againſt Duplaine in the ordinary courts of that town, three ſeveral times, and the bill was each time thrown out, the jury conſidering the conſul as acting under the ſupreme law of the land, the law of treaties binding the nation as the laws of the Federal government bind and ſupercede laws of the particular ſtates. Preſident Waſhington, however, by a public declaration and an official notification ſuſpended the powers of the French conſul, notwithſtanding his acquittal. Againſt this alſo Genet loudly complained, and the voice of hiſtory will declare, when the paſſions of the preſent times and the paſſing generation are no more, that the French miniſter on this occaſion did no more than diſcharge his duty as a faithful agent and an honeſt man.

The French government, however, were early in 1793 appriſed of the diſpoſitions that were already manifeſting themſelves in America, and of meaſures that were purſuing by England to draw the United States into the common league againſt their ally. The treaty formed with Ruſſia and executed on the twenty-fifth of March, 1793, has been particularly noticed in the early part of this hiſtory; and the extenſion of the principle of that treaty, "to reſtrain by all poſſible means neutral nations from taking advantage of their neutrality to ſupply France," was extended to treaties formed with Spain, Pruſſia, and others. The three neutral powers principally implicated in this tyrannical reſtraint were Denmark, Sweden, and the United States. According to the knowlege obtained of theſe deſigns, the convention publiſhed a decree on the ninth of May, 1793, declaring that French ſhips ſhould treat neutral veſſels in the ſame manner as the neutral powers ſhould allow the enemies of France to treat them, paying for their cargoes the ſame price as at the place of deſtination.

On the twenty-ſeventh of July, the convention having, from the conduct of Mr. Morris in France, the conduct of America in ſubmitting to the ſpoliations of England, and the treatment of the miniſter Genet in America, conceived that a real partiality to England was diſplayed, iſſued a further decree authoriſing their ſhips to regard neutrals only as they ſuffered other nations to treat them.—On the ſecond of September of the ſame year the convention paſſed a decree which has been compared with the Engliſh act of navigation; this decree, which was however held to be ſuſpended until the 1ſt of January 1794, was calculated to call neutrals, and eſpecially America, to a juſt ſenſe of the privileges enjoyed in French ports.

On the 6th of June orders were iſſued by England for the ſeizure of neutral ſhips according to the intentions of the Ruſſian treaty, and at the ſame time inſtructions were iſſued to their armed ſhips for the actual ſeizure of "all ſhips laden with the produce "of any colony belonging to France, or carrying proviſions or other ſupplies for the uſe "of ſuch colony." This order would apply to the ſhips of America alone, for the freights of other neutral powers do not deſerve to be conſidered of importance they are ſo few.

It will be ſeen here, that the deſign of England to ſtarve France, commenced by the ſeizure of her corn ſhips even in the moment of peace in the winter of 1792, was regularly growing up and extending its branches over every quarter of the world. Remonſtrances were forwarded to Mr. Thomas Pinckney, then miniſter from America at the Engliſh court, on the haraſſments of the American trade, and in a converſation of that miniſter with the Engliſh ſecretary of ſtate Grenville, communicated to the American government in a letter dated the fifth of July, 1793, it appears that lord Grenville explicitly and unreſervedly avowed, that it was perfectly underſtood to be the intention of Ruſſia and England in contracting the treaty concluded in March, 1795, to capture neutral veſſels in the very form and under the very ſtipulations laid down in the ſeveral treaties. In the ſame year the Engliſh miniſter, Drake, declared to the republic of Genoa—"That "in the preſent war againſt the uſurpers of the ſupreme power in France, no government "can declare itſelf neuter without becoming an accomplice."

With all this knowlege before their eyes, ſuch was the infatuation of the American government, that it continued to encreaſe in hoſtility againſt France; and at length the reſentments of the French government compelled them to ſend thither a new miniſter, Mr. Monroe, before mentioned. The ſucceſs of his miſſion has been before noticed; and the Engliſh government apprehenſive of throwing the United States into the arms of France, employed at the ſame time her uſual policy of menaces and conceſſions. Her emiſſaries were employed on the inland frontier of the United States to create the alarm of an Indian war; while her miniſter was authoriſed to open an accomodation by treaty.

On the eighth of January, 1794, ſhe iſſued a ſpecious qualification of her orders of the ſixth of November, 1793, and by reiterated attacks of policy and chicane the American government, or rather the preſident, was involved in a labyrinth of political perplexity which his age and his ſtrength of mind were not capable of extricating him from. Aſſailed by artful and perfidious men, who flattered his vanity, while they ſapped the foundation of his high reputation, he was ſeen daily to yield under the weight of the national cares, and from time to time his jealouſies were excited againſt the very men who alone were fond of his fame and eager to preſerve it inviolate along with the honor and proſperity of their country. The efforts of ſuch men became unavailing, and he was gradually engroſſed ſolely and entirely by perſons whoſe want of talents rendered them fit and pliant inſtruments of perſons unſeen who poſſeſſed more capacity with equal virtue.

In this condition of things the year of 1794 commenced. Fauchet had been appointed ſucceſſor to Genet as miniſter of France in America; the ſame intrigues and the ſame virulence againſt France which had been employed againſt his predeceſſor, were repeated againſt him, and with additional violence and acrimony. The effect was proportioned in a great meaſure to the cauſe. The inceſſant torrent of ſlander, was employed in a free country and among a proverbially religious and grave people, to ſupport the meaſures of adminiſtration! The hiſtory of England was diſarrayed of all the unparalleled and unequalled atrocities which has characteriſed it for twelve hundred years, and in every quarter of the globe, in order to preſent only thoſe traits worthy of praiſe in which it has been equalled by many other countries. This procedure was calculated to hold up France in the utmoſt extreme of deformity, and to attribute to the nation as its character what was not only its greateſt affliction, but an affliction produced by the barbarity and perfidy of thoſe nations with which it had to contend, and with which the American adminiſtration was now about to be leagued in bonds of amity, and who appeared ſolicitous to obliterate all remembrance of calamities the remains of which yet bluſh above the plains of America.

The ſucceſſive defection of Lafayette and Dumourier, while they encouraged the hopes of the advocates of monarchy in the United States, produced a contrary effect on thoſe weak men who trembled at the renewal of Engliſh horrors. It was a common ſentiment at that period and even down to the cloſe of 1796, that the hoſtility of France would not be ſo fatal to the domeſtic peace of America, as the friendly march of a body of Engliſh troops through the continent. The opinion was the ſentiment of experience; but unhappily for America, it did not produce the effect on public counſels which it might have been expected to produce. The more pungent fear prevailed, and the Americans in this one inſtance teſtified more to the benefits which they had derived from the aid of France in the revolution, and to the ſuperiority of the French character, than the evidence of volumes could afford. The Engliſh veſſels continued to prey upon the American commerce, complaints became general, as the evil was extenſive; and government was forced to liſten to the public voice. The preſident even began to feel the injuſtice of the aggreſſion, and the ſentiment of true dignity prevailed for a while over the intrigues of party. The power of America to repel was weak, and England knew it; ſhe knew alſo that by preſſing upon this weakneſs, America would be compelled to her only reſource of negociation, rather than riſque the afflictions of war, and that by the Engliſh ſuperiority in diplomacy, ſhe could obtain ſacrifices which in any other circumſtances than thoſe in which France was then placed, ſhe could never hope for.

On the 16th of April 1794, the preſident of the United States in a meſſage to the ſenate, nominated Mr. John Jay, as envoy extraordinary to England, wherein he ſtated that the appointment of ſuch a character, (he being then chief juſtice of the United States) "correſponded with the ſolemnity of the occaſion, that he would carry with him a full knowledge of the exiſting temper and ſenſibility of America, and be thus taught to vindicate her rights with firmneſs and to cultivate peace with ſincerity."

Soon after this appointment had taken place, early in the following May, Mr. Monroe was appointed miniſter to France; and he was inſtructed expreſsly "to inſpire the "French government with perfect confidence in the ſolicitude which the preſident felt "for the ſucceſs of the French revolution; of his preference of France to all other "nations, as the friend and ally of the United States; of the grateful ſenſe which he "ſtill retained for the important ſervices that were rendered to America by France in "the courſe of her revolution."

Upon the complexion of theſe two embaſſies it is uſeful to offer a few remarks. Jay had from the period of the negociations in 1783, when it appears he had actually entered into ſome ſecret and irregular communications with the Engliſh negociator, been ſtedfaſtly attached to Engliſh intereſts, his pride as well as that of Adams, appear to have been hurt by the ſuperior veneration and reſpect in which Franklin was held, and Jay particularly was offended concerning ſome ſlight which he had experienced in relation to his miſſion to Spain. His ſubſequent courſe of conduct as the American miniſter for foreign affairs, and even as chief juſtice, had manifeſted the ſame partiality. And Monroe who was a ſenator of the United States, had actually oppoſed his appointment, on the ground of his known partiality rendering him an unfit perſon to negociate for the redreſs of grievances with England, and a dangerous perſon conſidering that his partiality muſt be known and excite jealouſies elſewhere; Monroe had alſo oppoſed the appointment of Gouverneur Morris to France for ſimilar reaſons, his principles and politics having been always declaredly hoſtile to the republican government. The attachment of Monroe to the republican government was equally well known, and the above extract from his inſtructions was ſo perfectly in conformity with his ſentiments, that he, having firſt doubted the diſpoſition of his government, could no longer heſitate to accept the miſſion. In his inſtructions were theſe further remarkable points—"It is not improbable you well be obliged on the "head of Mr. Jay's miſſion to England to repel ſuſpicions of various kinds. But you "may declare the motives of that miſſion to be to obtain immediate compenſation for "our plundered property and reſtitution of the poſts." And in addition to Monroe's credentials he was alſo furniſhed with an addreſs to the French government from each of the chambers of congreſs, in which their attachment to France was expreſſed in the following terms:—"In executing this duty," ſays the addreſs, "the liberal ſuccours "which the United States received from the French nation, in their ſtruggle for inde-"pendence, preſent themſelves warm to the recollection. On this baſis was the friend-"ſhip between the two nations founded; on this baſis and the continued interchange of "regard ſince, it has grown; and ſupported by theſe motives it will remain firm and con-"ſtant." This was in behalf of the ſenate. The addreſs in behalf of the houſe of repreſentatives was equally emphatic and impoſing—it ſays, "In no manner could this "honourable and grateful function be more properly diſcharged than by ſeizing the "occaſion of declaring to the ally of the United States, that the cauſe of liberty, in " defence of which ſo much American blood and treaſures have been laviſhed, is cheriſh" ed by our republic with encreaſing enthuſiaſm; that under the ſtandard of liberty where-

" ſoever it ſhall be diſplayed, the affections of the United States will always rally."

The American miniſter was received in England with the greateſt eclat, and the formal republican was danced through the dazzling mazes of a voluptuous and orientalized court and capital. The American miniſter at Paris was at firſt received with ſuſpicion and reſerve. In England a treaty was concluded on the ninth of November 1794. In France the miniſter, who notwithſtanding the conduct of the American government and the ſuſpicion excited by the ambiguous miſſion to England, had by his frankneſs and confident aſſurances, not only removed diſtruſt but had reſtored the Americans to the good opinion which they had loſt with the government and the people; nay he had obtained a complete renumeration for the loſſes ſuſtained by ſeveral veſſels of his nation in conſequence of a general embargo laid on all ſhips in French ports, and this laſt renumeration was actually decreed on the day before the treaty with England was ſigned. He was further ſo ſucceſsful, that by a formal arret of the committee of public ſafety of the fourth of January 1795, the jealouſy was ſo far removed, that American ſhips were to be placed entirely on the footing of the ſtipulations of the treaty of 1778, and rendered to them even the complete exemption from all thoſe decrees which had borne hard on them as a retaliation for ſuffering the depredations of England.

But while this propoſition was diſcuſſing before the convention, advice was received in France that the negociation with England was ſo far from being a treaty for " immedi" ate compenſation for plundered property and reſtitution of poſts;" that it was not only a treaty of amity, but of ſuch amity as amounted to an alliance; that it not only ſurrendered rights of the American nation, but of France, and that even it had not ſtopped there but had contained ſtipulations ſubverſive of the eſtabliſhed law of nations. The American miniſter at Paris was kept in total darkneſs on the contents of this treaty; he could only inſiſt that the principles of his credentials were maintained, that his inſtructions were not violated, and that the government of his country could not in the face of the world ſacrifice its intereſts, its obligation, or its reputation.

The ſituation of the miniſter was irkſome and the political relations of France and America became critical and novel; and the American adminiſtration after concluding the treaty with England was ſeen attempting to throw the blame of the miſunderſtanding on their miniſter at Paris!—who was ſoon after recalled. A defection had taken place in the American councils in the meantime. Through what cauſe it has not been publicly declared, but about the period of the completion of the Engliſh treaty; Jefferſon who had been ſecretary of ſtate, reſigned, and was ſucceeded by Randolph, who alſo reſigned, in conſequence of political intrigues that belong excluſively to the American hiſtory. and was ſucceeded by Timothy Pickering, who was in office when Monroe was recalled. Fauchet the French miniſter had been ſucceeded by Adet in the courſe of that year, and Monroe was ſucceeded in the appointmeut of miniſter to France in the courſe of 1795.

The orders of the Engliſh miniſtry of the ſixth of November for the ſeizure of neutrals had excited much heart burning in America, and the preſident of the United States honeſtly demurred to the treaty until the order was recalled. The Engliſh miniſtry recalled it. The treaty was reciprocally exchanged, and the Engliſh miniſtry recommenced their captures under a renewal of the orders. By the medium of ſome of the American veſſels thus carried into England, American papers were received and forwarded to Paris, containing the whole of the proceedings on the Engliſh treaty and a copy of it. The Engliſh miniſtry and their friends in America had calculated upon immediate hoſtilities between the two republics; but the councils of France were otherwiſe diſpoſed; they determined not to receive the new American miniſter and to recall their own. They directed however ſuitable repreſentations to be made to theAmerican government. General Waſhington had reſolved to retire from the helm when the ſtorm became two ſevere for his age to manage it. The choice of the American people of a perſon for his ſucceſſor would determine the degree of attachment or reſentment which they ought to exhibit againſt America for the breach of faith in their public functionaries. Mr. Adams to the preſidential office and appointed Mr. Pinckney miniſter to France. In his individual character Mr. Pinckney was conſidered with reſpect, but the new preſident manifeſted very early that he carried into office all the paſſions of a partiſan and the irritability of an atrabilious habit. His principles of government were known, they had derived great celebrity from the circumſtances in which they were publiſhed and although deſtitute of all thoſe characteriſtics which deſignate the man of genius or philoſophy, they were otherwiſe too remarkable not to be remembered. His attachment to England became no leſs equivocal than his writings were adverſe to equal freedom, and he ſoon betrayed in his official communications, the meaſures which he would purſue were he alone to decide upon meaſures with France. But the French government was too ſenſible of the impotence of a government that after a vaſt naval preparation had truckled to a petty Barbary pirate and conſented to pay an annual tribute greater in amount than the whole profits of her trade to the Mediterranean.

The Engliſh authority, before quoted,* reſuming the ſubject of theſe differences, continues the hiſtorical narration by obſerving, that the miſunderſtanding between the two governments diſplayed itſelf more openly than before, in the refuſal to receive the ſucceſſor of Mr. Monroe. "Adet had notified ſo early as the 25th of November, 1796, to the American government, that the directory had ſuſpended him from all his functions. He had previouſly communicated to the ſecretary of ſtate a memorial recapitulating the complaints of the French republic againſt the government of the United States, and had communicated an arret of the directory of the 14th Meſſidor, (2d July) of the fourth year of the republic, enjoining the French ſhips of war to obſerve the ſame conduct towards the veſſels of neutral nations, as they had hitherto ſuffered with impunity to be obſerved by the Engliſh.

"The directory juſtified this decree by the ſecret approbation given by the Americans to this violation of the law of neutrality on the part of the Engliſh, who had ſeized on neutral veſſels, particularly thoſe belonging to Americans even in their very ports, and taken out of them whatever they found of French property, without any reſiſtance on the part of the American government. From this memorial it appeared that the French ambaſſador, in the beginning of the war, had made unheeded application and remonſtrances on this ſubject. The national convention had decreed, that conformably to the uſage then eſtabliſhed by the Engliſh, the property of that nation, found on board neutral veſſels, ſhould become lawful prize, but that American veſſels were excepted from this general meaſure. The conduct of the Engliſh in ſeizing on all American proviſion-ſhips had afterwards compelled them to reſcind this exception, and decree conditionally that the ſeizure of Engliſh property ſhould continue indiſcriminately until the Engliſh government ſhould definitively revoke the orders which it had given for this meaſure, and which were only ſuſpended by the embargo, laid on by the congreſs on the 26th of March, 1794. The convention having received information, that Mr. Jay was inſtructed to make remonſtrances to the Engliſh government reſpecting theſe acts of hoſtility, revoked the decree reſpecting American ſhips, hoping that this conduct would lead the American government to uſe every effort to induce the Engliſh to adopt the ſame meaſure. But his remonſtrances, if made, had no effect: the ſame acts of hoſtility were continued, and neutral veſſels coming out of or entering into French ports, were made prizes by the Engliſh.

* New Ann. Reg. 1796, p. 271.

"Further reclamations were made on the part of the French ambaſſador, to the American government on the twenty-ninth of September, 1795, which were unheeded; a memorial preſented on the ſame ſubject the twenty-ninth of March 1796, was equally unnoticed. It appeared from theſe papers, that not only neutral veſſels were ſeized, but ſailors were taken out of American veſſels to ſerve on board Engliſh ſhips, without any mark of diſapprobation on the part of the American government. Under theſe circumſtances the government of France was compelled to have recourſe to the ſame meaſures reſpecting neutral veſſels as the Engliſh government had adopted, and was permitted by the neutral powers to continue, without remonſtrances or reclamations on their part. Citizen Adet further obſerved, that, if they would take meaſures to render their flags reſpected by the Engliſh government, the ſame reſpect ſhould be ſhewn by the French republic; but if through weakneſs or partiality they ſuffered the Engliſh to ſport with their neutrality, they ought not to complain if the French, in order to reſtore the balance, ſhould continue to imitate in this caſe that conduct which the Engliſh had found it convenient or uſeful for their own purpoſes to adopt.

"The anſwer given by the American government to this remonſtrance, ſtated, in juſtification of their conduct, that the treaty made with France in 1778, formally expreſſed that neutral veſſels ſhould neutralize the cargo; whereas the treaty lately negociated (with England) contained no ſimilar regulation. The American government therefore was held to act in perfect conformity to the letter of both treaties; and though it was lawful for the Engliſh to ſeize French property on board American veſſels, the French were reſtrained by their treaty with America, from making repriſals in ſimilar circumſtances on the Engliſh. So far as the letter of treaties ought to influence the deciſion of the queſtion, the reclamation of the American government was founded; but whether that government was juſtified on the ſcore of political morality in concluding a ſubſequent treaty (in time of war) with England, ſo pointedly hoſtile to the intereſts of their former ally in this article, does not ſo clearly appear. In addition to the above memoral, citizen Adet ſoon after preſented a note recapitulating other grievances, among which was the infraction, on the part of the American government, of that article in the treaty with France which reſpected the guarantee of the French colonies by the United States. The ſpeech of the preſident to the American congreſs, and the anſwer of the vice preſident, contained recriminations, which, far from leading to any amicable explanation, or to conciliate the differences which had ariſen, tended to widen the breach which already exiſted, and fan the flame which it was ſo much the intereſt of both parties to have extinguiſhed.

"Whatever ſpecific cauſes of complaint the French government might have had againſt that of the United States on account of the treaty lately concluded with England, the diſpoſitions which led to the formation of the treaty, would alone have been ſufficient to have explained the reaſons of the general indignation of the French againſt them.

Accuſtomed of late to witneſs levees of miniſters from the conquered monarchs of the old eſtabliſhed governments in Europe, deprecate the vengeance or ſupplicate the friendſhip of the French republic, it was not without feelings of indignation that they ſaw the people whom they boaſted to have ſnatched from ſervitude and oppreſſion, and to have erected into independence and power, in violation of the ties of gratitude and friendſhip, and of thoſe bonds more commonly reſpected between nations, ſolemn and formal treaties, not only become indifferent in the obſervance of either, but join againſt them by forming the ſtricteſt alliances with their common enemy. This indignation had been hitherto tempered by the conduct of the American ambaſſador (Monroe) and by the repreſentations which the friends of both countries had occaſionally made; and it is probable that the breach would have been widened no farther than the temporary ſuſpenſion of the French ambaſſador in the United States, had not the American government, by exchanging ambaſſadors at this period, evinced further diſpoſitions of hoſtility; ſince no reaſonable pretence appeared for this exchange, but the attachment which the preſent ambaſſador (Monroe) had ſhewn to the cauſe of the French revolution.

"The news of the intended reſignation of the preſident of the United States had preceded the arrival of the new ambaſſador, Mr. Pinckney. This event, which was expected by the French government, had in ſome meaſure allayed this warmth, and it was hoped that an amicable arrangement would ſpeedily have taken place, as it was ſuppoſed that the choice of the United States would fall on a perſon leſs hoſtile to their intereſts; but as the exchange of ambaſſadors (ſhewed that they were miſtaken and) under the preſent circumſtances afforded ſo favourable an opportunity of expreſſing their feelings, they not only refuſed to permit the new ambaſſador to remain officially at Paris, but intimated to him that his reſidence as a private citizen was inexpedient. The directory nevertheleſs, when Mr. Monroe took leave, obſerved, as they had already done with reſpect to Sweden on a ſimilar occaſion, that the people of America not being implicated in the acts of their government, were ſtill objects of their eſteem; and expreſſed alſo their perſonal regard for the intereſt which Mr. Monroe, during his reſidence at Paris, had ſhewn for the welfare of the republic."

To the American reader theſe hiſtorical details by an Engliſh writer preſent a very ſerious and inſtructive leſſon. The pride, the ſelf-love, the generous, ſometimes erring, fear of ſhame, will impel the lover of his country rather to conceal, if poſſible, and if not, alleviate, actions which reflect upon his government. But when in ſpite of theſe natural deſires and affections, the loud voice of hiſtory has already proclaimed the diſgrace in which his country is involved, and that hiſtory proceeding from a quarter which the very nature of the caſe would incline to partiality, the reflection can no longer be confined to to the ſolitary ſorrow of the individual, but muſt produce either an apathy, which can indure ignominy, or an avowed and public proteſtation from every man who is alive to honor or natural character. The hiſtory of theſe unfortunate differences is not yet cloſed. Neither has the American government diſplayed a ſenſe of its true intereſts in the preſent ſituation of the world.

Prior to the departure of Adet for Europe, he notified by a ſhort advertiſement in the public papers on the fifth of November 1796 his recall by the directory. On the ſame day, he addreſſed a long memorial to the government wherein he expreſſed his own attachment and that of his nation to the American people, and his grief at the taſk which his duty impoſed on him, in being compelled to ſubſtitute the tone of reproach for the language of friendſhip, in addreſſing the American government, and tracing out the catalogue of grievances of which France had to complain. " When Europe roſe up in arms" ſaid he, " againſt the French republic at its birth; menaced it with all the horrors of war and famine; when on every ſide the French could not calculate upon any but enemies, their thoughts turned towards America; a ſweet ſentiment then mingled itſelf with thoſe proud emotions which the preſence of danger and the deſire of repelling it produced in their hearts. In America they ſaw friends. Thoſe who went to brave tempeſts and death upon the ocean, forgot all dangers in order to indulge the hope of viſiting that continent where for the firſt time the French colours had been diſplayed in favour of liberty. Under the guarantee of the law of nations, under the protecting ſhade of a ſolemn treaty, they expected to find in the ports of the United ſtates an aſylum as ſure as at home; they thought, if I may uſe the expreſſion, there to find a ſecond country." He then enters into a recapitulation of the principles that connected the two countries, the detail of treaties, and the breach of the articles. Having detailed theſe with great ability, he concludes with this intereſting and faithful apoſtrophe!

" Alas! Time has not demoliſhed the fortifications with which the Engliſh roughened this country—nor thoſe the Americans raiſed for their defence; their half rounded ſummits ſtill appear in every quarter, amidſt plains, on the tops of mountains. The traveller need not ſearch for the ditch which ſerved to encompaſs them; it is ſtill open under his feet. Scattered ruins of houſes laid waſte, which fire had partly reſpected, in order to leave monuments of Engliſh fury, are ſtill to be found. Men ſtill exiſt, who can ſay—there my wife tore her bleeding daughter from the hands of a brutal Engliſhman! Alas! The ſoldiers who fell under the ſword of the Britons are not yet reduced to duſt: the ploughman in turning up his field, ſtill draws from the boſom of the earth their whitened bones, while the huſbandman with tears of tenderneſs and gratitude, ſtill recollects that his fields have been moiſtened with French blood." This laſt addreſs of the French miniſter, and the preceding one were publiſhed. Strange to relate, the government of a free repreſentative republic, was offended at that act, while the ſame government loudly declaimed againſt the idea of ſeparating the government from the people, or againſt any attempt to have it preſumed that the " government and people"—were not " one and the ſame!"

Under the ſhape of a diſpatch to Mr. Pinckney at Paris, the American government publiſhed a reply to Adet's memorial, wherein every obligation of America to France was either denied, or the motives of France in lending her aid obliged to be ſufficient grounds to render them no longer binding after they were urged upbraidingly. The government ſoon after found itſelf placed by its temerity in circumſtances more critical, and an extraordinary ſeſſion of congreſs was called, which after waſting much time, refuſed to enter into hoſtile meaſures propoſed by the new preſident, whoſe ſpeech on the ſixteenth of May on the opening of the ſeſſion, was loaded with hoſtility, and accompanied by the correſpondence of two of the miniſters in Europe, calculated to inflame the paſſions of both nations. In the end three miniſters were diſpatched to France; they were received with that coldneſs which might have been expected, and time only can diſcover the iſſue of a quarrel which originated in a faction combined with the profligate government of England to effect deſigns, over which, if not fruſtrated, not only the preſent but future generations will have to deplore.

The materials for the hiſtory of the revolution, after the cloſe of 1796, are yet too imperfect in many reſpects to afford a connected chain of narration. Theſe events are alſo ſo momentous that it would be treating the ſubject unworthily, to reduce it to narrow bounds, ſince the nearer the war has approached to an apparent termination, the more intereſting has the ſubject become.

The leading events of 1797 are already, and thoſe of 1798 promiſe to be, next to the American and French revolutions, the moſt intereſting events that have ariſen in the annals of mankind. The eſtabliſhment of the powerful Ciſalpine republic in Italy, the reſtoration and reformation of liberty among the deſcendants of the ancient Ligurians, lately the Genoeſe republic. The march of the French armies into Germany, and their conqueſt of the Auſtrian dominions from the Rhine to Bavaria, and the dictation of a peace at only thirty leagues from Vienna, are great events for hiſtory.

A vaſt conſpiracy alſo, which was developed and fruſtrated in 1797, will form an intereſting part of the hiſtory of that year. In this plot were concerned ſome of thoſe who had diſtinguiſhed themſelves in the revolution, as Pichegru. The plot was detected in three ſeveral places at the ſame time, at Paris by the arreſt of Duverne du Preſle, the principal agent of the combined powers, who was ſeized and made a full confeſſion. The ſeizure of the emigrant count d'Antraigues by Buonaparte in Italy, and his papers. The detection and ſeizure of ſeveral packets addreſſed to Klinglin, an emigrant French general, by Moreau. The whole of theſe papers have not yet reached America, but the work of Calonne, publiſhed in 1796, and frequently quoted in this rapid ſketch of the revolution, clearly indicates the ſource and foundation of that plot.

In that work Calonne ſays,* "It now becomes indiſpenſable, that every party, that every power, that is an enemy to the preſent government of demagogues, which oppreſſes France under the ſpecious name of a republic, ſhould unite in one deſign, be animated by one ſpirit, and concur in one plan; and that they ſhould unanimouſly agree in preſenting to the eyes of a nation one ſingle object." Again,† "It is, however, in the very focus of the revolution that great effects may be operated, and it is from that point that every movement ſuſceptible of becoming general muſt originate; every other collateral movement muſt be only ſecondary to this primary object; as to the provinces, the only advantage to be derived from that quarter is to foment ſuch a diſpoſition," &c. After hinting at the outlines as he proceeds, he opens his plan,‡ by indicating the ſtate of parties in the French councils of ancients and five hundred, and recommends at large, that to the party which oppoſes the government, ſecret aid and money ſhould be ſent. An Engliſh banker found means to paſs to Paris early in 1797, the known friend of Pitt, the plot was ſoon after diſcovered.

At the cloſe of the year France was engaged in vaſt preparations for an invaſion of England, which was expected to take place in April or May, 1798.

* Political State of Europe for 1796, preface, p. v. † p. 17 in the note. ‡ p. 121 to 133.

END OF VOLUME THE FOURTH.

Index to the Fourth Volume.

A

ABANCOURT, nephew of Calonne, placed at the head of the war department, 151.

ABBE' SIEYES propoſes the aſſumption of the ſupreme legiſlative authority by the tiers etat, 8; his plan for the election of repreſentatives, 47; declines the office of director, 499.

ADDRESS of the national aſſembly to the nation, 58; of the king to the powers of Europe ſignifying his acceptance of the conſtitution, 88.

AEROSTATION employed by Jourdan at the battle of Fleurus, 391.

AGRARIAN law decree againſt, 263.

ALLIED armies divided in their plans of military operation, 291.

ALIEN BILL paſſed in England to injure France, 234.

ALPS paſſed by Buonaparte, 322.

ALVINZY marches an army into Italy, and is defeated at Arcole, 543.

AMBASSADORS of France arreſted on neutral territory, 300; ſeveral foreign, ordered from Paris, 539.

AMERICA, Engliſh intrigues there, 342, 343; cauſe a dangerous miſunderſtanding with France, 553; free examination of the diſpute, 554 to 575.

AMNESTY, a general one, of the laſt acts of the convention, 502; proves injurious to the republic, 501.

ANDERLECHT, the Auſtrians defeated on the heights of, 199.

ANGEREAU, diſtinguiſhes himſelf in Piedmont, 520; at the battle of Arcole, 543.

ANTWERP ſurrenders to the French, but is ſoon retaken, 199; congreſs of the allied powers there, 258; proceedings of remarkable, 259.

ARCOLE, battle of, 543.

ARCHDUKE Charles defeated by Moreau, 527.

ARISTOCRATS and Democrats, the earlieſt deſignation of party in the revolution, 11.

ARMY, pay of augmented, 115; allies and French, number of the, 379.

ASIA, French affairs there, 102 to 105.

ARTOIS, count of, flies from the public indignation, 17; his public robberies diſcovered in the red-book, 65.

ASSIGNATS, a paper medium repreſentiug money, ſo called, 70; immenſe numbers forged under the direction of the Engliſh government, 255; all contracts ordered to be paid in, and not in ſpecie, 264; great quantities of forged, ſent from England and paſſed through Germany under the Imperial paſſport, 405; remarks of Barrere upon, 417; more forged in England landed in France from Engliſh ſhips of war, 503.

AUCKLAND, his conduct in Holland, 233, 238.

AUNTS of the king departure of, 80.

AUSTRIAN committee, ſupported by the queen at Paris, 138.

AUSTRIAN troops commit horrid outrages after their defeat at Maubege, 293; and at Lauterbourg, 326; great mortality among, 383; obliged to croſs the Rhine, 447.

B.

BABOEUF, his conſpiracy, 536; condemned to death, 537.

BANKERS make great rejoicings on the return of Necker, 19.

BANNALITES a feudal privilege expoſed, 28.

BAILLY the celebrated aſtronomer appointed preſident of the national aſſembly, 9; his remarkable addreſs to the king as mayor of Paris, 15; is proſcribed by Robeſpierre and dies like a ſage, 323.

BARRAS ſignalizes himſelf at Toulon, 332; on the fall of Robeſpierre, 425; in a popular inſurrection, 497; is choſen a director, 500.

BARRERE propoſes a decree againſt an agrarian law, 263; endeavors to counteract faction, 269;

his report on the conduct of the Engliſh, 412; propoſes a decree to give no quarter to the Engliſh and Hanoverians, 413; accuſes Robeſpierre of tyranny; 425, preſents a new plan of government upon the fall of Robeſpierre, 433; his decree for giving no quarter repealed, 439; is attacked in the convention, 482; is ordered to be tranſported, but left behind at Oleron, and impriſoned, 489.

BASTILE ſtormed and taken, 14; the governor put to death with ſeveral others, and the priſon demoliſhed, ib.

BATTLES, the number of fought and the loſs of the allies, 393.

BERTRAND marine miniſter, flies to England, 126; his filly conduct, 222.

BEZENVAL ſtopt on his route to Switzerland, Necker cannot obtain a free paſſage for him, 28.

BIESME in the foreſt of Argonne, a ſtrong poſt, ineffectually attacked by the Auſtrians, 176.

BATAVIAN republic, the former Dutch republic ſo called, 469; proclamation of the French conquerors, 486; freedom guaranteed by Pruſſia and Spain, 531.

BIENEN, Auſtrians defeated near, 472.

BIRON, general, commands before Mons, 131; takes Quievrain, ib. diſorderly conduct of his troops, 132; repulſes the inſurgents at Lucon, 297; ordered to Paris, 298.

BED of juſtice held (the laſt) and the parliament baniſhed, 7.

BILLAUD Varennes denounces Robeſpierre, 422; tranſported to Guiana, 489.

BLOODHOUNDS employed by the Engliſh to hunt men to death, 517.

BOMMEL, iſland of, attacked by the French, 449.

BOUILLE his barbarous conduct at Nancy, 73, 75; his treaſon, 95; his ſhare in the king's flight, 222.

BLIESCASTEL taken by the French, 327; the Pruſſians obliged to abandon Deuxponts, ib.

BOURNONVILLE ſent to ſupercede Dumourier, 247; ſeized by Dumourier and delivered over to the Auſtrians with the commiſſioners of the convention, 249.

BOURBON family removed to Marſeilles, 264.

BREST diſturbances at, 23, 78.

BRETEUIL the favourite counſellor of the queen, 11; intrigues with Spain, 61; form a conſpiracy, 89; particulars of the plot, 92; fruſtrated by Calonne, 94.

BREZE, marquis de, his laconic meſſage to the national aſſembly, ſeverely treated by Mirabeau, 10.

BRIDPORT, admiral, gains a victory over the French fleet, 479.

BRIE, Jean de, moves and it is proclaimed that the country is in danger, 148; his plan for a corps of regicides, 174.

BRITISH government ſecretly hoſtile to the revolution at its dawn, 9.

BRISSOT, a diſtinguiſhed republican, 135; rendered odious by intrigues, 265; arreſted and proſcribed by Robeſpierre with the Girondiſts, 271; put to death, 318; his character by Garat and Madame Roland, 319; by Giry Dupre, 325.

BROGLIO, commands the troops round Paris, 12; informs the king that no dependance can be placed on the military, 14; compelled to fly France, 17; retained on the eſtabliſhment of mareſchals through the repreſentation of his ſon, 12; reſigns and declares for the emigrants, ib.

BRUNSWICK, his vain-glorious manifeſto, 154; his motives for returning from the army, 375.

BRUSSELS taken by Dumourier, but ſoon after abandoned, 199; Jourdan and Pichegru unite their forces there, 442.

BRUNEL, a deputy, killed in a tumult at Toulon, 489.

BUONAPARTE ſignalizes himſelf at Toulon, 339; commands the army of Italy, 520; dictates a peace to Sardinia, 522; croſſes the Po, 523, defeats ſeveral Auſtrian generals, ſee Wurmser, Alvinzy, Arcole, Lodi, Caſtiglione.

BURKE, his baſe deſertion of character, 236.

C.

CAEN, outrages there by the royaliſts, 22.

CAESAR'S camp, French driven from, 291.

CAGLIARI, an unſucceſsful expedition againſt, 257.

CALONNE, ſucceeds Necker, and is popular, 6; loſes his reputation, and convenes the notables, 7; obliged to quit adminiſtration, and Necker recalled, ib. enormous abuſes under him, 65; forms a deep conſpiracy, 89; intrigues of 91; his opinion of the allied powers, 111; further opinion, 258; another plot, 576.

CALENDAR a new French one, 308.

CAMUS propoſes meaſures for the ſecurity of the legiſlative body, 10.

CAMBON propoſes a coinpulſory loan of a thouſand millions, 298.

CAMILLE DESMOULINS, a ſportive writing of his made the foundation of an accuſation againſt Briſſot and the Girondiſts, 315; he proteſts againſt it, ib. proſcribed and put to death, 363; his wife alſo put to death by the tyrant, 369.

CAPET family, decree concerning, 300.
CAMP of 20,000 men propoſed to be eſtabliſhed by Servan, 140; oppoſed by the king, ib.
CARNOT and other deputies of the convention fight at the head of columns at Maubege, 293; honorable teſtimony in his favour, 482; choſen a director, 500.
CASTRIES wounds Lameth in a duel, for which his houſe is ranſacked, 78.
CASTIGLIONE, Würmſer defeated at, 529.
CARRIER, tried for his crimes at Nantz, 439.
CAPE of Good Hope taken by the Engliſh, 518.
CAVALRY, French, take ſeveral ſhips of war, 468.
CERET great victory gained at, by the republicans, 395.
CHALIER, an aſſaſſin employed by Robeſpierre, 297.
CHANDERNAGORE, admirable conduct of the French coloniſts there, 103 to 105.
CHARLEROI beſieged, and ſurrendered to the French, 389.
CHAPELIER preſident of the national aſſembly, 24.
CHATELET, court of, denounces Orleans and Mirabeau, 71; fall into contempt for their frivolous proceedings, ib.
CHARGES againſt Louis XVI. founded on ſecret papers diſcovered, 203.—See Iron-Chest.
CHAUDOT, a banker at Paris, negociates a loan for the Engliſh prince of Wales, 347; put to death ib.
CHAUVELIN French miniſter in England treated with contumely, 234; his conciliatory demeanor, 238; ordered to quit England, and the order publiſhed in the London Gazette, ib.
CHOISEUIL ſends an atteſtation concerning the king to the convention, 222.
CHURCH affairs diſcuſſed, 53 to 56.
CHILDREN, law concerning their education, 187.
CITIZEN the only appellation allowed in France, 196.
CLAIRFAIT propoſes a truce, 200; attacks the French, 243; obliged to retreat before Jourdan, 451; attacked at Juliers, and defeated with great ſlaughter, 457.
CLERMONT Tonnere his decree for an amneſty, 19.
CLERGY called upon diſplay to diſintereſtedneſs, 28; offer a great contribution, 53; become refractory, 78; nonjuring, allowed penſions, 79; made liable to tranſportation, 188.
CLAVIERE appointed miniſter through Dumourier, 136; diſmiſſed through him alſo, 141; proſcribed by Robeſpierre, 325.
CLOOTS an enthuſiaſt put to death, 355.
COBLENTZ taken by the French, 452.
COLLOT d'Herbois, attempt on his life, 409; tranſported to Guiana, 489.
COLOGN taken by the French, 452.
COALESCED powers, their ſpecious aſſurances, 114; act more openly, 125; diſagree, See duke of York.
COBOURG defeats the French near Aix la Chapelle, 243; his intrigues with Dumourier, 247; manifeſto on the occaſion, 149; publiſhes another in open contradiction of the firſt, 259; ſignal defeat of, by Jourdan, 293; endeavours without effect to raiſe the Germans in a maſs, 445.
COMBINED powers manifeſt hoſtile intentions, 79; Calonne's opinions of, 111; number of in 1793, 289; their politics examined, 338; jealous of each other, 381.
COLOURS, the national, ordered for the navy, 78; another decree concerning, 347.
COMMISSION of twelve, 286; Marat denounces them, and they are diſſolved, 269.
COMMISSIONERS ſent to ſeize Dumourier, 247; delivered over to the Auſtrians, 248.
COMMITTEE of public ſafety, 263; members of, 264; after the fall of Robeſpierre, 432.
CONDE, prince of, flies France, 17; appears in arms on the frontiers, 87, 91.
CONDORCET a diſtinguiſhed republican, 135; preſents a plan of conſtitution, 258; propoſes a new convention, 268; reſolves to die to defeat the tyrant, 325.
CONDE, fortreſs, taken by the French, 448.
CONTI, prince of, alarmed at the numerous publications on civil liberty, 7.
CONQUESTS of France in 1794, 473.
CONSPIRACIES, of Favras, 64; of Maillebois, 65; at Lyons, Toulon, and Marſeilles, 66; two by Calonne and Breteuil, 89; of the Engliſh miniſter detected, 255; (ſee spies.) at Straſburg, 327.
CONSTITUENT aſſembly, ſee National.

CONSTITUTION propoſed, 37; arrangements for carrying into execution, 56; new one of 1793, completed, 282; of 1795, called of the third year, adopted, 493.
CONVENTION, national, meets, 188, 193; committee of conſtitution appointed by, 194; vote the abolition of royalty, ib.—diſſolve themſelves, 479.
CORAZZA coffee-houſe, conſpiracy there, 274.
COUNTER-revolutionary clubs eſtabliſhed, 80.
CORVEE aboliſhed through the influence of Turgot, 6; attacked, 28.
CONTRIBUTIONS voluntary ſuggeſted by Necker, 36.
CORDELIERS club, Danton popular in it, 88; tumult in, 254; openly at variance with the Jacobins, 352.
COUR-plenicre a deſpotic project attemptedineffectually by Louis XVI. 7.
COURTRAY taken by the French, 148.
CORN-ſhips of France ſtopped in Engliſh ports in 1792, contrary to law and treaty, 234.
CORNWALLIS his baſe conduct to the French at Chandernagore, 105.
CORDE', Charlotte, her heroiſm, 284; tried and put to death, 286.
CORSICA plots of the Engliſh there, 396; ſurrendered to the Engliſh government, 397; evacuated, 542.
CREVACOEUR, taken, 453.
COUTHON produces a decree againſt foreigners, 370; put to death with Robeſpierre, 427.
CUSTINE's conqueſts on the Upper Rhine, 184; attacks the Pruſſians, 261; ſacrificed to party, 302.

D.

DAMPIERRE a brave general killed, 260.
DANTON a popular character in the Cordeliers club, 88; firſt conceived the deſign of the republic, 135; appointed miniſter of juſtice, 170; his vigorous propoſition, 170; decreed, 171; propoſes to raiſe the people in a maſs, 300; the decree for that purpoſe, 301; proſcribed by Robeſpierre, 362; put to death, 364; his character, 365
DEBT of France at the revolution. 4.
DECLARATION of rights propoſed by Lafayette, Sieyes, and Mounier, 38; baſis of paſſed in the form of reſolutions, ib. new declaration propoſed in the convention, 264.
DEMOCRATS and Ariſtocrats, the earlieſt deſignation of parties, 11.
DESCARTES, his aſhes removed to the pantheon, 404.
DESEZE, counſel of Louis, his defence, 213; propoſes an appeal to the people, 223.
DEFENCE of Louis XVI. 213.
DECLARATION of Louis, 229.
D'ESTAIGN his diſſuaſive letter to the queen againſt a flight, 50.
DEGO in Piedmont, battle of, 521; the Auſtrians defeated there a ſecond time, ib.
DELESSART convicted of treaſon, 126; beheaded, 170.
DESILLES a brave youth, 73.
DOMAINS public to be diſpoſed of, 341.
DESAIX defeats the Auſtrians in a ſignal manner at Platoberg, 447; bravery at Khel, 546.
DEUX PONTS the Pruſſians driven out of, 327.
DILLON, general Theobald, his unhappy fate, 131.
DILLON, general Arthur, defends the paſs at Bieſme, 176; put to death by Robeſpierre, 369.
DIRECTORY choſen, intrigues of the royaliſts on the occaſion, 499; characters of thoſe elected, 500.
DRESS diſtinctions of aboliſhed, 57.
DROIT d'Aubaine aboliſhed, 70.
DROUET a poſt maſter ſtops the king, 96.
DUEL between Caiſtries and Lameth, 78.
DUFORT, count, his great activity in a conſpiracy, 92.
DUPRE', Giry, his magnanimity, 325.
DUVEYRIER, diſpatched to the emigrants with concilatory propoſitions, treated with indignity, 100.
DUMOURIER appointed miniſter, 128; his conduct as miniſter, 136; adviſes the diſmiſſion of Roland, 141; ſucceeds Lafayette and calls a council of war at Sedan, 175; his critical poſition in the foreſt of Argonne, 177; attacks the Auſtrians at Boſſu, 198; gains the immortal victory at Gemappe, ib. drives the enemy from Tirlemont and Liege, 200; diſgraces himſelf for ever, 201; goes to Paris, and determines upon the invaſion of Holland, 241; his plans, 242; two commiſſioners arrive in his camp, 245; holds an illicit intercourſe with colonel Mack an Auſtrian officer, ib. forms a perfidious concert with the enemies of his country, ib. the Auſtrians violate the engagement, 246; other commiſſioners and a ſucceſſor ſent to his camp, by the government, 247; his troops cannot be ſeduced from their patriotiſm, 249; delivers the deputies and Bournonville into the hands of the enemy as hoſtages, ib. flies to the Auſtrians, ib. the military cheſt which he had removed, is ſeized and brought into the republican camp, 250; his character, 250; his perfidy the ſource of great public calamity to France, 254.

DUVERNE DU PRESLE, ſeized at Paris, and a great conſpiracy againſt France developed, 576.
DUNAN, ſee Duverne.
DOMINGO, St. troubles there, 89, 117, 123; a deputation from to the convention, 345; their addreſs, 346; war there, 459.
DUBOIS CRANCE, his bold conduct, 254.
DUGOMMIER, general, ſignaliſes himſelf at Toulon, 333, and in the war againſt Spain, where he is killed, ſee Spain.
DUNKIRK, beſieged by the duke of York, 291; ſummons the place; the governor's reply, 292.

E.

ELIZABETH, princeſs, denounced, 359; tried, 406; unjuſtly put to death, 407.
EMIGRATION commences from France, 57; law againſt, 81.
EMIGRANTS appear armed under Conde in Alſace, 87, 91; commence hoſtility on the flight of the king; 99; raiſe troops in the king's name, who formally diſavows the authorization, ib. treated with unmerited lenity by the national aſſembly, 99; an envoy ſent to offer them honorable terms treated with inſult, 100; iſſue proclamations, 113; decree againſt, 115; the king refuſes to ſanction it, ib. a more rigorous decree paſſed, 124; property of ſequeſtered, 127; taken in arms to be put to death, 196.
EMPEROR takes the command of the troops on the Rhine, 583; inaugurated in ridiculous pomp at Bruſſels for the laſt time, ib.
ENGLAND, ſtate of parties there in 1792, 235; arbitrary conduct of, ſee Treaties, Genoa, Tuscany, &c.
ENGLISH MINISTRY exult in the diſtreſſes of France, 139; recal their ambaſſador at Paris after the tenth of Auguſt, 170; letter on that occaſion, ib. conduct of on the death of Louis, 233; they waver after the battle of Gemappe, 238; form a vaſt conſpiracy, which is detected, 255; their intrigues in America, 342; fatal effects of to the United States, ſee America; publiſh their motives for continuing the war, which is replied to, 350; ſend two miniſters to Vienna to prevent the emperor from making peace, 450; machiavelian conduct in negociating for peace, ſee Malmesbury and Wickham.
ENGLISH troops, miſerable condition of, in the winter campaign of 1794-5, 470; embark for England, 471.
ENGLISH goods prohibited to be imported into the Batavian and French republics, 541.
ENGLISH officers perfidious conduct of, 459, 461.
EXECUTIVE council refute the allegations of England, 234: demand a categorical anſwer from England, 238.

F

FABRE d'Eglantine denounced, with others, by Robeſpierre, 357.
FAMARS, action at, 260.
FANATIC prieſts their ferocity, 80, 117; the oppoſite extreme of thoſe who relinquiſhed the prieſthood, 327.
FAVRAS, his conſpiracy to carry off the king, 64.
FAYETTE, appointed to command the national guards of Paris, 16; ſingular addreſs of ſix grenadiers to him, 43; marches to quell a diſturbance at Verſailles, 47; reſigns his command, 88; reaſſumes it, ib. fired at by a royaliſt aſſaſſin whom he ſets at liberty without puniſhment, 100; takes command of an army on the frontiers, 122; defeats the Auſtrian army near Maubege, 133; addreſſes a letter to the army on the tranſactions of the tenth of Auguſt, 167; cauſes him to go into exile, 168; ſeized with others on neutral territory and impriſoned by the Auſtrians, ib.
FEDERATE republicaniſm a dangerous project in France, 298.
FEDERATION, or national feſtival, 67, 150.
FEMALE warriors in the French armies, 186.
FERRAUD, a deputy, put to death in an inſurrection, 487.
FEUDAL ſyſtem, afflicting abuſes of, 6; attacked by Noailles, 26; by Karengal, 28; aboliſhed, ib. German princes take offence at, 79.
FEUILLANS ſociety of inſtituted, 120; excites the enmity of the Jacobins, ib.

FINANCES, ſtate of, 32, 122; report on, 311, 485.
FITZGERALD, ſee Switzerland.
FLEURUS, memorable battle of, 390.
FLAG, the national tricolor, ordered for the navy, 78; another decree concerning, 347.
FLEET of merchantmen taken by the French, 518.
FLORENCE, audacious conduct of the Engliſh miniſter there, 341.
FOMBIO, Beaulieu defeated there, 523.
FOREIGNERS, decree concerning, 492.
FOULON and Berthier, two courtiers of foul reputation put to death, 16.
FOUQUIER Tainville a creature of Robeſpierre, with ſeveral others put to death, 485.
FOX oppoſes a war with France, 237; character of, ib.
FRANCIS ſucceeds the emperor Leopold, 126; precipitates the war, 129.
FRANCOIS of Neufchateau his ſpeech to the convention, 193.
FRANKENTHAL taken by the French, 452.
FRANCONIA, the French invade, ſee Jourdan.
FRATERNITY decree of 197; moved by Larivilelière Lapaux, 233.
FRANKFORT taken by the French, 185; Pruſſians appear before it, and barbarous conduct there, 185, negociations opened at, betwen France and Pruſſia, 381.
FRANKING letters aboliſhed, 58.
FRENCH, character at the commencement of the revolution, 5; affairs in Aſia, 100; bravery under Dumourier againſt the Pruſſians, 177; invade Heſſe 185; combined againſt the, 278; Kaiſerſlautern, 337; enter France and defeat the Auſtrians at the celebrated mountain Verte, 447; affairs of 1794, 557.
FREYTAG, general, defeated, 292.
Friends of the people, a ſociety ſo called at Paris, afterwards Jacobins, and why, 7.

G.

GARAT, miniſter of Juſtice, his account of two remarkable converſations, 277; his account of Danton, 319.
GAME-LAWS aboliſhed, 29.
GARDE DU CORPS give an entertainment, at which the queen is preſent, 42; occaſions a commotion, in which ſeveral of them are put to death, 49.
GENEVA affairs of, 183, 540.
GENOA, arbitrary conduct of the Engliſh miniſter there, 341.
GHENT ſurrenders to the French, 299.
GEMAPPE memorable battle of 198.
GIRONDISTS ſecede from the Jacobins, 190; ſome account of, 191; injured by the perfidy of Dumourier, 254; rendered unpopular by factious enmity, 264; their moderation fatal to them, 265; denounced, ib. arreſted, 271; appeal to the nation, ib. conduct againſt them on their trial, 316; condemned, 317, executed, 318.
GOLTZ, baron, the Pruſſian ambaſſador, poiſoned by the allied powers, 489.
GIRONDISTS, remarkable procedure of ſix of them, 43.
GRENVILLE the Engliſh ſecretary of ſtate his inſolence, 43.
GREY and Jervis their perfidious breach of public faith, 461.
GUARDS, the French, declare their reſolution not to fire upon their fellow citizens, 14.
GUILLOTINE introduced, 178.

H.

HAILES, the Engliſh miniſter at Copenhagen, his arbitray conduct, 340; repelled, 341.
HAM in Weſt phalia, a royaliſt reſcript iſſued thence, 226.
HEBERT an incendiary ordered out of priſon, 269; oppoſes his patron Robeſpierre, 353; denounced with others, 354; tried and executed, 255.
HESSE invaded by the French, 185.
HESSIANS great plunderers, 181.
HOCHE drives the Pruſſians out of Deux Ponts, 327; ſtorms and carries the ſtupendous works of Bieſſhoffen and Wrotte, 327; commands the armed force at Paris, 487.
HOUCHARD his miſconduct, 292; put to death, 293.
HOOD his proclamations and conduct at Toulon, 329.
HOWE, gains a victory over Villaret off Breſt, 400.
HOLLAND invaded by Dumourier, 241; invaſion of projected by Daendels, 464; conquered and reſtored to freedom by the French, 465 to 469.
HUGUES, Victor, an intrepid character, 460.

HUNGARIANS behave bravely at Gemappe, 199.

I.

ICE the French invade Holland by croſſing, 465.
IMPRISONMENT arbitary, aboliſhed, 57.
INDIA-company decree concerning, 310; ſuppreſſed, ib.
IRELAND expedition againſt, 551.
IMPERIAL paſs-port given to convey forged aſſignats into France, 405.
INTIRGUES cauſe inſurrection at Paris, 100.
INVALIDS, hotel of, ſtormed and great quantities of arms taken thence by the populace, 14.
INSURRECTION at Paris, 14, 173, 483, 536, 539.
IRON Cheſt diſcovered in the Thuilleries, 203; further particulars of, 405.
IRON frontier of France, vain attempt to conquer, 343.
IRON mountain, Clairfait defeated there, 443.
INVIOLABILITY of the king inſiſted on, 202; refuted, 203.
ISLANDS diſcovered by the French, decree concerning, 129.
ITALY operations there, 520, 528, 539. See Buonaparte.

J.

JACOBIN ſociety its influence and power, 111; origin and character of, 112; the Girondiſts ſecede from, 190; become the minions of Robeſpierre, 264; ſhut up, 439; re-opened by Billaud, 483; and ſhut up by the convention, ib.
JERVIS and Grey their perfidious breach of faith in the Weſt-Indies, 461.
JESUS and the Sun, the title of fanatical and counter-revolutionary aſſociations, 489.
JEWS releaſed from penal oppreſſion, 70.
JUDICIARY departments eſtabliſhed, 69.
JOURDAN ſucceeds to the command in Flanders, and takes a ſtrong poſition at Maubege, 293; attacks and defeats Cobourg in a ſignal manner, ib. retakes the greater part of Flanders, 293; removed by Robeſpierre, 374; re-appointed and defeats the Auſtrians after an action of two days, 385; takes Arlon and beſieges Charleroi, 388; gains the immortal victory of Fleurus, 390; drives Cobourg before him, 442; gains the victory of Soignes, ib. takes Namur, 444; takes Liege, ib. drives the Auſtrians from their intrenchments on the heights of Chartreux with great ſlaughter, 450; takes Duſſeldorf, 511; compelled to retreat, 513; advances into Franconia, 530; reſigns 545.

K.

KERSAINT reſigns his ſeat in the convention, 233.
KHEL taken by Moreau, 525; attacked by the Auſtrians, 544; gallant conduct of Lacombe and Deſaix there, 506; ſurrendered. ib.
KLEBER defeats Clairfait at the Iron-mountain, 443; takes Maeſtricht, 456.
KING not to be at any time more than 20 leagues from the legiſlature, 83.
KNIGHTS of the poniard, whence derived the title, 82.

L.

LAHARPE, general, his brave conduct in Piedmont, 520; at Codogno, where he is killed, 523.
LAMBEL propoſes the abolition of nobility, 63; ſupported by Pelletier, Lafayette, Montmorency and Chappelier, 64.
LALLY-TOLLENDAL propoſes a new title for the king, 30; reſigns his ſeat with others, ib. offers to defend Louis as his counſel, 222.
LAMOURETTE, his celebrated motion, 149.
LAMBALLE, princeſs of arreſted and ſent to priſon, 167; put to death, 172.
LAMBESC, prince of, charges with his regiment and kills ſeveral people, the firſt blood drawn in the revolution, 13.
LA LUNE, near Chalons, Pruſſians encamp at, 177.
LAMOIGNON MALESHERBES deſires time to offer arguments to the convention, 223.
LARIVEILIERE LEPAUX, his motion of fraternity, 223; choſen director, 500.
LAND-TAX eſtabliſhed, 70.
LAUNAY, governor of the Baſtile, put to death, 14.
LAVAUX, a French general in the Weſt-Indies, his manly conduct, 459.
LANDREMONT, general, defeats the Auſtrians at Wieſſembourg and Lauterbourg, 293; again 294.
LAVOISIER, the celebrated chemiſt, proſcribed by Robeſpierre, 323.

LANDAU taken by Cuſtine, 184.
LE BON, an agent of Robeſpierre, denounced, 480; puniſhed, 491.
LECOINTRE accuſes Barrere, Collot, and Billaud, 436; are ſentenced to be tranſported, ſee their names.
LEGISLATIVE aſſembly conſtituted, 106; king meets them, 107; ſend a meſſage to the king on the public danger, and he attends them, 119; they ſpontaneouſly terminate their ſeſſion, 188; character, 189.
LEOPOLD, his cautious politics, 79, 114, 121, 122; becomes leſs reſerved, 124; dies, 126.
LETOURNEUR choſen a director, 500.
LIANCOURT, duke of, preſident of the aſſembly, 17; propoſes a medal to be ſtruck, 30.
LIBERTY, principles of, ardently diſcuſſed, 7.
LETTRES de cachet, horrible engine of deſpotiſm, 6; totally aboliſhed, 57.
LILLO, fort, French ſhips paſs, 241.
LINDET, Robert, on the ſtate of France in 1794, 457;
LISLE beſieged by the allies, 182; forced to raiſe the ſiege, 183.
LOAN of thirty millions propoſed, 33.
LODI, battle of, 524.
LONGWY taken by the allies, 169; retaken by the French, 180.
LOTTERIES aboliſhed, 79.
LOUVAIN ſurrenders to the French, 109.
LOUIS XIV. his uſurpations and extravagance a prominent cauſe of the revolution, 4.
LOUIS XV. a debauched and abandoned character, 4.
LOUIS XVI. traits of his character, 4; alarmed at the proceedings of the national aſſembly, and orders their hall to be ſhut, ib. accepts the fundamental articles of the conſtitution with a reſervation, 43; accepts it pure and ſimple, 44; dangerous ſituation at Verſailles, 48; obliged to go to Paris, 49; eſcorted to the Thuilleries, 50; diſplays unuſual firmneſs, ib. intends to fly to Metz, ib. plots to carry him off, ſee Favras and Maillebois. Takes the oath at a public feſtival, 69; is about to proceed to St. Cloud, 87; ſharp reply to a grenadier, ib. obliged to remain in Paris, 88, flies from Paris with his family, 94; ſtopt and obliged to return, 97, 98; accepts the conſtitution, 105; refuſes to ſanction the decree againſt the emigrants, 115; and againſt the prieſts, 118; character of by madame Roland, 336; contradicts a publication of Petion, 139; oppoſes the formation of a camp near Paris, 140; his conduct to the populace in the Thuilleries courageous, 145; repairs to the aſſembly on the tenth of Auguſt, 159; ſent to the temple, and a commiſſion of twenty-four appointed to prepare charges againſt him, 202; private papers diſcovered, 203, ſee iron chest; proteſts againſt the ſentence of death, 223; character, 251.
LOUIS XVII. ſon of Louis XVI. ſo called, 256; dies. 491.
LUCAS, a Batavian admiral, betrayed with his fleet into the hands of the Engliſh, 543.
LUXEMBOURG, Auſtrians defeated near, 290; taken by the French, 511.
LUXEMBOURG palace, aſſigned to the directory and named after their office, 500.
LYONS revolt, at, 283;

M.

MACK, colonel, meets Dumourier, 245; plans a new courſe of military operations, 375; quits the army in diſguſt, 391.
MACNAMARA, an Iriſh-French captain, killed in a popular tumult at the Mauritius, 103.
MAESTRICHT taken by Kleber, 456.
MAY the thirty-firſt, 270.
MARAT firſt noticed, 88; active in the meaſures of 2d September, 173; denounced by Salles, 267; accuſes 300 deputies of the convention, 257; put to death by a woman, 285; character of, 287.
MANUEL reſigns his ſeat in the convention, 233.
MANDATS, a new paper medium introduced, 538.
MAUBEGE, Auſtrians defeated at, 260; French take a ſtrong poſition near it, 293.
MAURI, abbe, defends the church, 54.
MARRIAGE, law of regulated, 187.
MASSACRES of September, 172.
MANTUA conſpiracy laid there, ſee Dufort; blockaded, 529; ſee Wurmser.
MAINMORTE or vaſſalage, attacked, 28.
MALMSBURY, lord, concludes a treaty between England and the Stadtholder, for the payment of Pruſſian troops, 382; appointed to negociate at Paris, 547; deluſive mode of conduct and obliged to quit Paris, 550.
MAILLEBOIS, his plot to carry off the king, 65, 66.
MANIFESTO of Brunſwick cauſes great irritation at Paris, 154.
MASSENA diſtinguiſhes himſelf in Piedmont, 520.
MARSEILLOIS active in the affair of the tenth of Auguſt, 162.

MAROONS, barbarity of the Engliſh to, 517.
MAXIMUM the law of, 347; repealed, 480.
MARIA ANTOINETTE an ambitious woman, 4; influence fatal to her huſband, 11; highly wounded by the limitation of the prerogative, 41; preſent at a ſeditious feaſt, 42; occaſions her life to be threatened, 48; is ſaved by the bravery of a ſoldier, ib.; appears at a balcony with the king and her ſon, and obliged to go to Paris, 49; flight from Paris, 94; character of by Madame Roland, 137; her ſpirited conduct on the tenth of Auguſt, 160; her trial, 303; ſentence, 306; death, 307; character, ib,
MENIN taken by the French, 148,
MENTEOLD, St. royal family ſtopt there, 96.
MENTZ taken by the French, 185; the Pruſſians lay ſiege to, 262; retaken, 286.
MERZNICH the ſtrong mountain of ſtormed and taken by the republicans, 451.
MINISTER, the Engliſh, character of, 237.
MINISTERS appointed by Louis, 31; changed, 78; declared reſponſible, 87, excluded from legiſlative functions, ib.; changed, 119; again, 124; again, 126; again, 128; 141; 150; 151; 195.
MILITARY ſchool inſtituted, 411.
MILITARY promotion newly arranged, 418.
MIOMANDRE gallant conduct of, 48.
MIRABEAU, his bold reply to a meſſage from the king, 10; members decreed inviolable on his motion, ib.; his opinion on tythes, 35; ſupports a reform in the church, 54; becomes a courtier, 61; opinion on the diſpoſition of property, 83; character, 84.
MIRANDA, general, commands the right wing of the army under Dumourier, 242; inveſts Maeſtricht, 243; ſiege raiſed, ib.
MONS ſurrenders to the French, 199.
MONTESQUIOU, general, enters Savoy, and received with open arms, 183; marches to Geneva, and is obliged to take refuge in Swiſſerland, ib.
MONTGILLARD, a ſpy of the Engliſh court, his account of France, 403.
MOUNT CENIS action there, 395.
MOIRA commands an expedition from England 297.
MONUMENTS of royalty deſtroyed, 300.
MONTMEDY, the king and queen fly towards, 96.
MONTMORIN interrogated by the aſſembly, 113.
MOREAU takes Nieuport, &c. 444; takes Cadſand, 445; defeats the enemy at Tripſtadt, 447; ſucceeds Pichegru, 453; takes Khel, 525; enters Briſgau and defeats Wurmſer, 526; defeats the archduke, 527; marches into Germany, 530; marches along the Danube, and defeats the Auſtrians near Augſburg, 531; gallant retreat, ib.
MOUNTAIN faction why ſo called 152; ſome account of, 190; gain unbounded power, 257.
MONSIEUR only remains of all the branches of the royal family, 81; flies and paſſes the frontier in ſecurity; 98, decree againſt him, 113.

N.

NANTES, diſturbances at, 23.
NANCY, Bouille's wicked conduct there, 72.
NAMUR taken by the French, 200.
NAPLES, king of, declares war againſt France, 300; ſeeks peace and it is granted, 527.
NATIONAL cockade worn by the king, 161.
NATIONAL aſſembly conſtituted, 8; annul all exiſting taxes, ib; alarms the privileged claſſes and court, 9; door of their hall ſhut by the king, and they aſſemble in a tennis-court, 9; meet in a church and chuſe Bailly preſident, ib.; the king declares their reſolutions void, 10; informs them they may adjourn to Soiſſons or Noyau, 12; addreſs the king on the troubles at Paris, 13; dignified conduct on the king's flight, 95; diſſolves itſelf, 105; character of, 106.
NATIONAL inſtitute eſtabliſhed, 502; feſtival of, 541.
NATIONAL convention conſtituted, 188; addreſs the nation on the treaſon of Dumourier, 266; diſſolves itſelf, 497; character of, 498.
NAVAL action between Villaret and Howe, 400; in the Mediterranean, 478; in Bay of Biſcay, 479.
NAVAL equipment ordered, 61.
NAVY, diſorders in, at Breſt, 77; ſtate of, 1794, 399.
NEUTRAL powers, treaties againſt, 339; order of the Engliſh government againſt, 343; treatment of by England, ſee Genoa, Tuscany, America, and Hailes.
NETHERLANDS abandoned by the French, 48; invaded by the allies and reconquered by the French, 366, 368.
NEERWINDEN battle of, 244; Dumourier ſuſpected of having treacherouſly connived at his own defeat, 245.
NEWFOUNDLAND, French expedition againſt, 542.

NECKER's efforts to reſtore the proſperity of France by loans and economy, 6; acquires applauſe and enmity by his efforts, ib. is diſmiſſed, ib. recalled and adviſes the aſſembage of the ſtates-general, 7; great popularity, 11; ſuddenly ordered to quit France, 13; recalled, 15; finds his influence with the people weak, 18; a decree of amneſty propoſed in honor of his return, 19; ſoon reverſed, 20; propoſes a temporary loan of thirty millions, 33; propoſes a voluntary contribution, 36; his letter on the ſuſpenſive veto returned unopened, 38; loſes his popularity, 51; reſents the diſcovery of abuſes in the red-book, 65; his reputation ſunk, 66; publiſhes a book in defence of nobility, 74; his character, 75.
NISMES, outrages there under colour of religion, 67.
NICE, the whole country of ſubmits to the French, 184.
NIMEGUEN forſaken by the Engliſh, 454; who fire upon their allies, the Dutch, in their retreat, 455.
NOIRMOUTIER taken from the rebels, 273.
NOBLES wholly exempt from taxes, 6; reſiſt an accommodation with the tiers etat, 8.
NOBILITY purchaſable, 6; propoſed to aboliſh, 62; decreed, 63.
NOAILLES diſtinguiſhed on the popular ſide, 26.
NON-JURING prieſts allowed penſions, 79; baniſhed in conſequence of their violence, 117.

O.

OCHS, Mr. of Baſle, his attachment to France ſaves his country from a war, 491.
O'HARA, the Engliſh general, wounded and taken priſoner at Toulon, 332.
O'MARA, governor of Dunkirk, his reply to the duke of York, 292.
ONEGLIA ſubmits to France, 395.
OPINIONS different on the revolution, 4.
ORGANIZATION of laws, a committee appointed for, 484.
ORDERS of nobility and clergy unite with the commons, 12.
OSTEND, taken by the French, 200; great quantities of forged aſſignats found there, 393.
ORLEANS, duke of, refuſes to enter into objections againſt reform, 7; diſplays great zeal in the cauſe of civil liberty, 11; declines the office of preſident, 13; withdraws to England, 51; returns, 69; proſcribed and put to death by Robeſpierre, his character, 324.
OUTRAGES at Aix, 80; Lyons, and Vannes, ib. in Paris, 100.

P.

PAINE, Thomas, a diſtinguiſhed republican, 135; elected by four ſeveral departments to a ſeat in the convention, 194; his opinion on the ſentence of Louis, 224; his reply to Burke, 237; impriſoned by Robeſpierre, reaſſumes his ſeat, 439.
PACHE miniſter of war, 194; diſmiſſed, 233.
PAOLI betrays the republic, 262.
PAPERS, private of Louis, See Iron-Chest.
PARIS, great commotions at, on Necker's diſgrace, 13; divided into ſixty diſtricts and elect deputies, ib. the populace of proceed to Verſailles, 43; oblige the aſſembly to ſend a deputation to the king, 44; Petion choſen mayor of in oppoſition to Lafayette, 120; in great alarm at Brunſwick's manifeſto, 157; the commune of intimidate the convention, 270.
PARLIAMENT, of Paris baniſhed, 7; ſoon recalled, ib. of the provinces ceaſe from all functions, 31.
PARMA and Modena contributions levied on, 523.
PARTY firſt diſtinctions of, 11; party ſpirit appears in the aſſembly, 24; ſtate of 71, 134, 189; ſtate of on the treachery of Dumourier, 253; on the proſcription of the Gironde, 274; in 1794, 344; in 1795, 481; under the conſtitution of the third year, 501; grows to an afflicting exceſs, 546.
PAVIA, treaty of diſcovered, and heads of, 109.
PAY of the army augmented, 61.
PEACE, propoſal for by the convention, upon the baſis of an exchange of the queen for the betrayed deputies, 264; treaty for with Pruſſia, 460; with other powers, ſee Treaties; overtures for by England, See Wickham and Malmsbury.
PELETIER aſſaſſinated, 233.
PERE Ducheſne, a popular Journal ſo called, 254.
PETION choſen mayor of Paris, 120; proclaims the intention of the king to fly, 139; ſuſpended from office, 148; reſtored, 150; demands the depoſition of the king, 157.
PILNITZ, convention at tranſpires, 108; when ſigned, 110; acknowledged in the Engliſh Houſe of Commons, 339.

PICHEGRU carries the Auſtrian redoubts at Hagenau, 327; defeats the allies at Courtray, 384; retires ſick to Bruſſels, 453; his motives ſuſpected, 454; oppoſes the invaſion of Holland, but when determined upon joins the army, 465; removed to another command, 471; his conduct remarkably ſuſpicious, 512; removed from the army, 534.
FIRMASENS, action at, 389.
PO, river croſſed by Buonaparte, 523.
POLITICS of the allied powers examined, 338.
POLL-tax ordered to be levied double, 7.
POLIGNAC, the family of, obliged to fly France, 17; their ſhameleſs robbery of the public diſcovered in the red-book, 66.
PLAN of the French campaign, 133, 375.
PLOT againſt the conſtitution of 1795, 465; a tumult thereupon, 496; appeaſed, 497.
POPE interferes in the revolution, 79, 117.
POPE'S territory invaded, 527.
PORENTRUI incorporated with France, 197.
PONDICHERY, ſee Aſia.
PRIESTLY, Dr. elected to the French convention, but declines the honor, 194.
PRIESTS, fanatic, their ferocity, 80; taken in arms to be put to death, 315; their fury, 489.
PRINCES of the blood alarmed at the dangers that threaten monarchy, 7.
PRISONERS, decree concerning, 348.
PRISONS, ſeveral forced and priſoners releaſed, 11,
PROCLAMATION iſſued by the king, expreſſing his intention to reſide in Paris, 52; another authoriſing martial-law, 53; on the country being declared in danger, 151; of Dumourier, 249.
PROTESTANTS, the deſcendants of thoſe who ſuffered by the edict of Nantz, reſtored to their patrimony, 70.
PROVISIONAL executive council, their order for the execution of Louis XVI. 229.
PROVISIONS, an equal quantity to private ſoldiers and general officers, ordered by the convention, and the rule extended to the navy, 447.
PROVINCES, ſeveral renounce their excluſive privileges in favour of the nation, 29; the ancient names and boundaries of annihilated, 57.
PRUSSIA declares againſt France, 148; king oppoſes arming the people, 380; negociates with France, 381, 489.
PRUSSIANS repulſed at Bieſme, 176; again and defeated after a cloſe action of 14 hours, 177; deplorable condition at Champaigne, 178; their propoſitions to Dumourier, ib. ſolicit a truce to bury their dead, granted, 179; raiſe the ſiege of Landau, 328.
PRIMOGENITURE, law of debated, 83; aboliſhed ib.
PUBLIC functionaries obliged to remain at their ſtations, 83.
PUISSAYE a counter-revolutionary incendiary, 296; appears again at Quiberon, 504.

Q.

QUEEN of France, ſee Marie Antoniette, convention propoſe to exchange her for the betrayed deputies, 264; trial of, 303; ſentence, death, character, 307.
QUESNOY taken by Scherer, 448.
QUIBERON, an expedition planned in England againſt, 503; troops landed at, 504; hiſtory of the tranſactions, 505, to 510.

R.

RABAUT de St. Etienne propoſes an union of the three orders without effect, 8; proſcribed, ſee Girondists.
ROCHAMBEAU reſtores tranquillity at Straſburg, 23; takes command of an army on the frontiers, 122; reſigns in diſguſt, 132.
RED-BOOK, enormous waſte of public money diſcovered by, 65; reſented by Necker, ib.
REGENCY debated, 83.
REGENT, the elder brother of Louis aſſumes that title, 256.
RELIGION dragged into contention to aggravate ignorance againſt reform, 66.
RELIGIOUS worſhip declared free, 338.
REUBEL choſen a director, 500.
REPUBLIC decreed, one and indiviſible, 264.
REPUBLICAN club, members of, 225.
REVOLUTIONARY tribunal inſtituted, 257; rules of, 262.
REPUBLICANS avow their principles on the flight of the king, 96; their efforts, 135.
ROBESPIERRE, an obſcure individual, 88; appointed public accuſer, 171; ſucceſsful in his intrigues with the clubs, 190; denounced by Laſource, but the charge quaſhed, 194: gains boundleſs power, 257; directs the Jacobins, 264; a converſation of his, remarkable, 277; alarmed at the death of Marat, 286; employs Chalier, at Lyons, 297; inſtitutes a ſolemn mockery of religion, and acts the high-prieſt, 407, 409; a young woman wiſhes to kill him, is put to death, 410; hatred gathers round him, 414; appaled by Cambon, by Bourdon, and Tallien, 415; abſents himſelf, 418; appears in the convention, 419; driven from the tribune, 424; put in arreſt with Couthon and St. Juſt, 425; ſuffers death with his brother and others, 427; character, 428; compared with Cromwell, 430.

RHINE, operations on, 524; the Auſtrians driven from, ib, ſee Moreau.
REVOLUTION cauſes of, 4; pervades all France, 18.
RIGHTS of man propoſed and oppoſed, 24; declaration of, 39; new declaration promulged, 282.
RONSIN, an incendiary, his deſparate propoſition, 254.
ROSSIGNOL, general, defeats the rebels in Vendee, 298.
ROLAND an upright man, appointed miniſter through Dumourier, 136; diſmiſſed, 141; a letter preſented to the king by, which he lays before the aſſembly, 145; perſecuted by Robeſpierre, 265.
ROLAND, Madame, her character of Dumourier, ſee Dumourier of Briſſot, ſee Briſſot, is proſcribed after the fall of the Gironde, 319; her defence, 320; death magnanimous, 323.
ROUSSEAU, a ſtatue erected to his memory, 79; aſhes of removed to the pantheon, 404.
RUSSIA the Engliſh treaty with concerning neutral powers, 339.

S.

SAAR-Louis, taken by the Auſtrians, 327.
SALLES, a remarkable converſation of his with Garat, 279.
SALT-tax aboliſhed, 70.
SANTERRE appointed commandant of the military force of Paris, 159.
SARDINIA, king of, arreſts the French ambaſſador, 183; war declared againſt him, 335; actions there, 458; compelled to ſeek an ignominous peace, 522.
SAVOY incorporated with France, 196.
SCARCITY, very great at Paris, 21; cauſes commotion, 32, 42. 43.
SCHERER inveſts Landrecy and takes it, 448; takes Conde, Valenciennes, &c.
SERVAN appointed war miniſter, 136; propoſes a camp near Paris, 140; diſmiſſed, 141.
SCHELDT, the opening of, a pretext for war, 234, 240; French ſhips paſs up that river to Antwerp, 241.
SENTENCE of death declared againſt Louis XVI. 223.
SEPTEMBER ſecond, inſurrection of, 173.
SEVENTY-one members proſcribed by Robeſpierre, reſtored to their ſeats, 481.
SIEYES propoſes a declaration of ſupreme legiſation, 8; his ſentiments on tythes, 35; his plan of repreſentation admirable one adopted, 57;
SICILY, ſee Naples.
SHERIDAN, his opinion in the Engliſh commons on the war, 237.
SLAVERY aboliſhed in the French colonies, 346.
SPAIN and England diſpute and arm, 61; interferes in the fate of Louis, 221; war againſt 335, 394; Spaniards overrun Rouſillon, 256; ſues for peace, ſee Treaties.
SOIGNES, victory obtained by Jourdan there, 442.
SOUTHERN departments adhere to the Gironde, 283.
SPIRES taken, 185.
SPIES of England, 28 of them ſeized in France with their correſpondence, 255; ſixty more, 299; more, 354.
STATUES and other antiquities taken as contribution from Rome, 528.
STADTHOLDER flies to England, 497.
STAMP-duty a grievance complained of in France, 7.
STOCK-jobbing fomented in France, by England, 310.
STRASBURG diſturbances there, 22; quelled by Rochambeau, 23.
SUSPENSIVE veto propoſed, 37.
STATES-general publiſh a declaration againſt France, 242; aboliſhed, ſee Holland.
ST. JUST driven from the tribune, 422; executed with Robespierre.
ST. CLOUD, king about to go thither, is prevented, 87.
ST. DOMINGO, ſee Domingo.
ST. MEARD, remarkable caſe of, 174.
ST. PRIEST, intrigues of, 66, reſigns, 79.
SWEDEN, king of, refuſes to receive a diſpatch from France, 114; ſacrificed by Ankerſtrom, 128.
SWISS-guards diſmiſſed, 127.

SWITZERLAND, arrogant behaviour of the Engliſh miniſters there, ſee Fitzgerald and Wickham.

T.

TALLEYRAND Perigord, his bold propoſition, 53.
TAXES, debated, 25; propoſed to be equalized by St. Fargeau, 29.
TALLIEN attacks Robeſpierre, 423.
TENNIS-court, the national aſſembly meet there, 9.
TERROR pervades Paris, 407.
THIONVILLE beſieged by the allies, 182.
THUILLERIES, ſeveral perſons killed in the gardens of, by Lambeſc, 13; a great number of armed men privately introduced there, 82; populace force the gates and enter the palace, 145; in alarm and put in a ſtate of defence on the 10th of Auguſt, 158.
TIRLEMONT taken by the Auſtrians, 244.
TIERS-etat, or third eſtate, debates on the number of its repreſentatives, 8.
TITLES of Monſieur and Madame aboliſhed, 198.
TIPPO Sultaun ſends an embaſſy to France, 101, diſappointed by the reſerve of the French, ib, attacks Cranganore, and gives a colour for war on the part of the Engliſh, ib. who ſend private ſuccours to the rajah of Travancore, 102; a great confederacy formed againſt him, ib.
TROOPS large bodies of, marched towards Paris, 12.
TOBAGO taken by the Engliſh, 337.
TOULON, conſpiracy there opened by the Engliſh, 288; perfidy and breach of faith by the Engliſh there, 331; the allies expulſed thence, 334; deplorable ſtate of the betrayed royaliſts, 335.
TOURNAY unhappy affair at, 131.
TREATY of England, with Ruſſia, Heſſe-Caſſel, Sardinia, Spain, 339; with Sicily, Pruſſia, Baden, Portugal, Heſſe-Darmſtadt, 340; of England with Pruſſia, in 1794, a remarkable one, 382.
TREATY of France, with Tuſcany, 480; with Pruſſia, 490; with Spain, 491; with Sardinia, 522; with Naples, 527; Wirtemberg and Baden, 530; with Spain and Pruſſia, new and ſtronger treaties, 520; Parma, 542.
TREVES, the French enter it, 447.
TRIAL of Louis XVI. 203 to 229.
TRONCHET, counſel of Louis, proteſts againſt the ſentence of death, 224.
TRUGUET, admiral, appears before Onaglia, and the treachery of the inhabitants induces him to deſtroy the town, 184; unſucceſsful expedition of, 257;
TURGOFF, a French admiral, betrays his truſt to the Engliſh, 315.
TUSCANY ſues for peace and it is granted, 480.
TURGOT cauſes the abolition of the corvee, 6.
TYTHES propoſed to be aboliſhed, 34; ſentiments of Mirabeau and Sieyes thereupon, 36; aboliſhed, 36.

V.

VALENCIENNES, bad news from, 265; ſurrendered by the French, 289; taken by the French 448.
VALEZE reports upon the trial of Louis, 202,
VERDUN captured by the Auſtrians, 199.
VERSAILLES, the populace of Paris merch to, 43; great outrages committed there, 45, 46; Lafayette arrives there, ib.
Veto, or abſolute negative of the king, unpopular, 37.
VENGEUR a French ſhip, the heroiſm of her crew, 420.
VENDEE aſſemblies of inſurgents there, 255; country deſcribed, 294; the civil war renewed, 475; the chiefs of the inſurgents ſubmit, 476; revolt again, 503; Hoche appointed to command againſt the inſurgents, 519; ſubjugates them, 520.
VENLO and NUYS taken by the French, 452.
VICTORIES of the French number of, 474.
VINCENNES, caſtle of creates alarm, and an inſurrection, 71.
VILLARET, commands the French fleet in a naval action, 399; is defeated but obtains his object, 400.
VIENNE, archbiſhop of, oppointed preſident of the aſſembly, 13.
VOSGES, the inhabitants of barbaroufly treated, 180

W.

WAR, right of declaring, declared to belong to the nation, 62; war of conqueſts decree againſt, ib.; declared againſt the emperor, 130; plan of the campaign bad, 131; declared againſt England, 239; and the ſtadtholder, 240; againſt Spain, 258.

WAAL, the French paſs it on the ice, 465.
WALES, the Engliſh prince of, negociates a loan in France in 1794, 347; the banker executed, 347.
WEST-INDIES, war there, 89, 117, 123, 335; temper and diſpoſition of the Africans, 336; operations of the Engliſh there, 458, 515.
WHITOLCK, an Engliſh colonel, his baſe behaviour, 459.
WINTER, general de, paſſes into Holland, 446.
WICKHAM, the Engliſh agent's arrogant propoſitions, 534.
WIMPFEN, Felix, his brave conduct at Thionville, 182; his perfidy, 297.
WISSEMBOURG, Auſtrians defeated near, 293; taken, 327; retaken, 328.
WOOLSTONCRAFT, Mrs. quoted, 5.
WORMS taken by the French, 185.
WOMEN and children barbarouſly butchered by the Pruſſians, 291.
WURMSER attacks the French on the Lauter, 326; takes Wieſſembourg, horrid barbarity of his troops, 327; takes Saar Louis, ib.; defeated by Moreau, in the Briſgau, 526; marches an army into Italy, 528; beaten at Caſtiglione, 529; throws himſelf into Mantua, 530.
YORK, duke of commands at Famars, 261; undertakes the conqueſt of French Flanders. and marches againſt Dunkirk, 291; has a treacherous communication with the commandant, which is diſcovered by the French, 292; the governor removed and put to death, ib. takes Lincelles, ib. defeated and forced to fly, 293; quarrels with Clairfait, 383; repulſes the French, 386; out-generaled by the French, his diviſion deſtroyed, and he narrowly eſcapes by the fleetneſs of his horſe, 387; purſued and defeated at Malines, 443; burns his magazines to an immenſe amount, and flies from Antwerp, 444; retires behind Breda, ib. forced to quit that poſition, 449; retreats again, 452; flies from Nimeguen, 455; quits the army and returns to England, 466.
YPRES, taken by the French, 148; but ſurrendered to the allies, ib. retaken by Moreau, 391.

ERRATA.

Page 2.	line 4.	from the bottom,	for eminent,	read	imminent.
29.	— 9.	———	— ſurrounded	—	ſurrendered.
50.	— 19.	from the top,	— adoleſcent	—	ſomnolent.
86.	— 5.	from the bottom	— conſtitution	—	people.
89.	— 18.	———	— Choiſeuil	—	Bretueil.
112,	— 6.	from the top,	— conſtitution	—	people.
473.	— 8.	from bottom.	— nine,	—	ten.
552.	— 5.	———	— his	—	their.
———	— 3.	———	— ſuſpenſion	—	ſuffuſion.
553.	— 8.	from the top	— That	—	Thus.
———	— 13.	———	— their	—	theſe.
———	— 16.	———	— ſtretched	—	ſketched.
554.	— 8.	———	— noval	—	novel.
———	— 23.	———	— became	—	becomes.

INDEX

TO THE

SECOND VOLUME.

A.

ARMY, an enormous one, 263.

ANJOU, duke of, his cruel liberty to Oliver Cliſſon, 175; appointed regent of France in caſe of the king's death, 177; takes the king of Naverre's poſſeſſions in Languedoc, 180; his cruel edict at Guienne, but which he revokes, 181; ſeizes his predeceſſor's treaſures, 202, 205; differs about the regency and poſſeſſions with the dukes of Berry, Bourbon, and Burgundy, which is ſettled by arbitration, 203; prolongs the reſidence, and enlarges the privileges of the Jews, 204; the people come to his palace demanding a repeal of the taxes as promiſed by king John, 205; he commits repeated acts of injuſtice on the treaſury, 216; makes an irruption into Italy, is crowned king of Sicily, 230; after being reduced to an abject ſtate, is killed, 230; his character, 205.

D'ARTEVILLE, Philip, count of Flanders, is appointed head of the troops at Ghent, 218; routs the count of Bruges, takes the town, and maſſacres its inhabitants, 219; applies for and obtains aſſiſtance from France, 220; engages with the army of Cliſſon, and de Vienna, and is ſlain with moſt of his army, 222.

ALENCON, duke of, cited to anſwer a plot to aſſiſt the Engliſh, 408; confeſſes his intentions, 409; his trial and ſentence to remain priſoner for life, 410; releaſed by Lewis XIth, 426; enters a league with the duke of Burgundy, 526; is ſeized by the king, and ſentenced as before, 527; dies in priſon, 531.

ARC, Joan D' the famous maid of Orleans. The manner of introducing herſelf to the king, ſoliciting to lead the army, and promiſing to relieve Orleans, then cloſely inveſted, 352, 354; obtains many victories, though never fought herſelf, 355; ſhe is wounded, which diſpirits the troops, ib.; compels the ſiege of Orleans to be raiſed, 356; takes Troyes, 359; requeſts leave to rerire, but is refuſed, 359, 362; takes Moutier, 363; herſelf and family highly honoured by the king 363; is taken priſoner, 364; rigorous and inſulting treatment while in captivity, and the unjuſt means taken to promote her inquiſitorial trial, 367; her examination, 368, 372; an infamous meaſure to promote her deſtruction, 373; her cruel death, 374, but amiable character, ib.; after ſhe had been dead twenty years, her ſentence was reverſed, and her memory honoured, 375.

ARMAGNAC, count of, joins a confederacy againſt the duke of Burgundy, 286; tranquillity reſtored, 287; meets a numerous army of the Duke's, but without giving battle, 289; engages the Pariſians with great ſlaughter, ib.; is ſent for to court, and made prime miniſter and conſtable of France, 309; his proceedings, 310; in an inſurrection is given up and committed, but afterwards releaſed, 319; his party in Paris expelled, and he murdered, 320.

ARTOIS, Robert, duke of, detected of forgery, flies to England, 17, 20; re-embarks in an Engliſh fleet and takes Vennes; but again looſes it and is mortally wounded, 34.

AUBRIOT, Hugh, appointed provoſt of the merchants, 208; is cited to appear before the eccleſiaſtical tribunal, and condemned, 212; is releaſed from priſon by the populace, retires and ends his days in Burgundy, 214.

B.

BRITTANY declare their general oppoſition to the king's proceedings againſt their duke, 183.

BRITTANY, Mountford, duke of, difference with de Blois about the right of poſſeſſion, 156; makes head againſt the army of the king of France, ib.; kills Charles de Blois; his ſtratagem to ſave himſelf, 158; cited to Paris to anſwer a charge of rebellion, and condemned to loſe his eſtates, 182; concludes a treaty with the Engliſh, 180; at the ſolicitation of his ſubjects, arrives at St. Malo to repel a French invaſion with great marks of joy, 185; at a loſs how to act after the king's death, as his officers refuſes to obey him; he makes a treaty with the new king, 209; invites Cliſſon to his caſtle, where he puts him in irons, and orders him to be drowned, but through the ſtratagem of Bavalan the governor he is preſerved, 238; goes to Paris to meet the king of England, and leaves Cliſſon regent, 258; procures from Richard a reſtoration of Breſt, ib.; dies, 261.

BRITTANY, John, duke of, heads an army for the general defence of France, 309; mediates a peace between the dauphin and the duke of Burgundy, 322; preſerves tranquillity, 333; is decoyed by Oliver count of Penthievre, and taken priſoner, but releaſed by his nobles, 334; dies, 344.

BERRY, duke of, moſtly ſhared in the fortunes of the duke of Bourbon, renounces all profits and emoluments in the council for the general good, 284; his unſucceſsful affectation of modeſty to procure attachment, 285; retires from court, but returns again, 286; dies 313. See Charles.

BURGUNDY, duke of, appointed regent by the king, 177; beſieges Ardres, 179; meets the Engliſh army, but is prevented from attacking them by the king's death, 188; his popularity, 256; entruſted with the management of the king's children, ib.; an inveteracy between him and Orleans, 263; he receives the reigns of government, 264; in repairing to accommodate differences which had ariſen in his dominions, he expires on the road, 266; his character, 302.
BURGUNDY, John the fearleſs, duke of, takes his ſeat in the council, 267; oppoſes taxes and becomes the idol of the people, ib.; aſſembles troops againſt the queen and duke of Orleans, who fled, 268; he prevents them from taking away the dauphin, 269; is pacified with Orleans, with whom he unites in the government, 270; his hatred to Orleans, which produces his aſſaſſination, 271, 272; confeſſes the murder and flies, 274; his power awes the court, who negociate his return, 276; returns and appears in the council to juſtify the horrid deed, and extorts from the infane king a juſtification of the murder of his brother, 277; again obtains the government, ib.; beats the Liegois with great ſlaughter, 280; his great popularity notwithſtanding his horrid deeds, 281; his confidence reinſtated by his publicly begging the king's pardon, 282; appointed director to the dauphin, who now poſſeſſed ſupreme authority, 285; a powerful confederacy formed againſt him by ſeveral princes, which he as powerfully provides againſt by increaſing his allies, 286; peace obtained, 287; applies to England and obtains ſuccours, 288; meets the Armagnacs with a numerous army, but could not come to action, 289; returns to Paris, where he acquires new ſtrength, 290; his cruelty, ib.; when overcome by numbers he contrives a peace, 290, 291; horrid plot, 292; mortified by the dauphin, 294; renews an inſurrection in Paris, ib.; again treats, 297; loſes his popularity in Paris, 299; oppoſes the new conſtable and enviegles himſelf into favour with the new dauphin, 311; plots to extirpate the government, ib.; after being active in many diabolical ſtratagems, he propoſes to aſſiſt Henry IV. of England to take France, 314; joins the Engliſh army with 60,000 men, 316; a party of his followers procure an entry into Paris, 318; he arrives in Paris with the queen, 320; propoſes to the dauphin to ſhare the government, which is rejected, but at length enters into a treaty, by which he obtains it, 328; in an intercourſe with the dauphin he is murdered, 330; his character, 267, 271.
BURGUNDY, Phillip, the good, enters into a confedracy with the Engliſh monarch to revenge the death of his father, 332; repreſents the king at a treaty of peace with England, 335; joins forces with the Engliſh, 338; has the offer of the government at the death of Henry V. of England, but refuſes, 342; after a long attachment to the Engliſh he concludes a ſeparate peace with Charles VII. of France, 380; forms a pretext for war with the Engliſh, 381; becomes a dread to the king of France, 408; his duplicity, 412; obtains forgiveneſs for himſelf and all who adhered to him during the reign of Lewis XIth's father's reign, 425; death and character, 470.
BURGUNDY, Charles, count, afterwards duke of, marries Catharine of France, 385; is highly honoured by Lewis XI, 427, 429; a reverſe, 432; incurs his father's diſpleaſure, 441; commands an army againſt the king's forces, and after a deſperate engagement ſeparates, 451; at war with the Liegois, 467; by an intermarriage with England and the death of his father, his power is much increaſed, which compels the king to make great advantages to him in a treaty, 475; goes againſt the Liegois and narrowly eſcapes, 482; is jealous of a propoſal made to prince Charles, the dauphin, to marry the heireſs of Caſtile; he therefore offers his daughter to the prince, which is refuſed, 490; a raſh and fatal act, 509; accuſes Lewis of the murder of his brother, 522; is defeated in his plans, 524; forms a plot to aſſiſt the king of England to conquer France, 531; his perfidy, 535; treacherouſly delivers up the conſtable to the king, by whom he is beheaded, 540; goes againſt the Swiſs, but is worſted, ib. 541; after irreparable loſſes, is killed in battle, 544; the king of France, on his death, ſubdues great part of his dominions, and his daughter marries the heir of the crown of Germany, Maximilian, 551.
BEDFORD, duke of, appointed by Henry V. of England, regent of France, 342; exacts an oath of allegiance to the Engliſh monarch from the Pariſians, 343; after going to ſettle affairs, as regent, in England, he returns, 350; his many defects under the proweſs and power of the maid of Orleans, 352, 362; loſes his wife, which diſſolves his union with the duke of Burgundy, 378; dies, 381.
BALUE, cardinal, becomes the king's confidential, has a narrow eſcape, 457; encourages the king, 476; his attachment, 485; perfidy, for which he is confined twelve years in an iron cage, 487.
BULL, origin of the golden, in the Romiſh church, 92.
BOURBON, duke of, is entruſted with the care of the young king, 203; preſerves his influence at court, 241; retires, 245, 286; refuſes to attend court with the duke of Burgundy, the murderer of the duke of Orleans, 276; arms againſt lord Viry, a marauding invader of rights, whoſe army he ſcouts and takes him priſoner, 283; joins a powerful confederacy againſt the duke of Burgundy, but before it could be put in operation he dies, 286, 287.
BERTIZAC, prime miniſter to the duke of Berry, a ſtratagem to work his deſtruction, 244.
DES BORDES routed by ſir J. Harleſton, and his army entirely deſtroyed, 181.
BUCHAN, earl of, aſſiſts the dauphin with troops from Scotland, and beats the Engliſh, for which he obtains the office of conſtable of France, 337; is killed, 347.
BUCKINGHAM, duke of, arrives in France with a large army, 187; challenges the French army, 188; after a tedious and unſucceſsful march arrives in Brittany, and beſieges Nantes, which he is obliged to raiſe, 209; returns with his troops to England, 211.
BREST, beſieged by the duke of Brittany, 237.
BATTLES, Crecy, 41; Poictiers, 81; Roſbec, 222; Agincourt, 309; of Herrings, 352; Montcherry, 450; Liege, 482; at ſea between the Spaniſh and Engliſh fleets, which was decided in favour of the former, 171.
BARBAZON, the brave commander of Melun, taken priſoner, 335; reſcued by the army after eight years impriſonment, 361; gains a compleat victory with 3000 men over 8000, 366.
BEAUVOIS, the infamous inquiſitor, who tried Joan of Arc, whom ſhe relieves, 373. See the plate.

C.

CUSTOM, a curious one of ſelling priſoners their freedom, 456.

CHIVALRY, see Knight. Charolois, see Burgundy.
CLISSON, Oliver de, commands a brigade, which puts Du Gleſclin's army to flight, 158; his act of cruelty, 172, 175; is beſieged in Kempurlay, but eſcapes, 176; conquers Brittany, 179; agrees to ſurrender all the fortified places in Brittany to the king, 183; waits at table at the coronation of Edward VIth, 205; made conſtable, 207; attacks the Flemiſh, and routs them with ſlaughter, 220; gains a compleat victory, 222; is inviegled into the power of the duke of Brittany, who impriſons him, 238; ranſoms himſelf and returns to Paris, where he meditates vengeance on Mountford, 239; by an artful ſcheme of Mountford's, is attacked by Craon, and left for dead but recovers, 250; on the aſcendency of Berry and Burgundy, his ruin is determined, to evade which he flies, but is tried and his property confiſcated, 254; becomes a ſecret enemy, ib.; is reconciled to Mountford, duke of Burgundy, 257; is left regent during his journey to Paris, 258; is adviſed by his daughter to murder the children of Mountford and ſeize the dukedom, but enraged at ſuch inhuman advice, he throws a javelin at her, 261; dies, 270.
CHARLES, afterwards duke of Berry, 429; flies to Brittany, which is a ſignal of revolt, 443; brings an army to beſiege Paris, 453; enters into a negociation, 454; poverty, 466; obtains the province of Guienne, 487; weakneſs, ib.; has an acquiſition to his apanage, 489; ſends to demand the heireſs of Caſtile, ib.; which he afterwards breaks off. Burgundy offers his daughter, but in vain, 490; afterwards renews that propoſal, but which never took place, 512; deceives his ſubjects, 516; enters into a league againſt France, 519; is poiſoned by his brother, the infamous Lewis XIth, 520.
CAPTIVITY, a tedious one, 346.
CLARENCE, duke of, takes Pontoiſe, 328; made governor of Paris, 336; brings his army againſt that of the dauphin, where he is ſlain and his army diſperſed, 337.
CALAIS, the famous ſiege of, ſee the plate 49.
CRUELTY, act of, 113, 134, 170, 172, 175, 206, 218, 219. 222, 223, 225, 280, 290, 297, 309, 320, 321, 339, 377, 390, 468, 524, 540, 548, 554, 557.
CRAON, at court, 247; is expelled through the perfidy of Mountfort, who blames it on Cliſſon out of revenge, 248; he meditates a repriſal, and with a banditti attacks Cliſſon, and leaves him for dead, 250; flies into Brittany, his effects are confiſcated, his houſe deſtroyed, and his wife turned deſtitute into the ſtreet, ib.; he is demanded by the king, but denied by Burgundy, ib.
CHARLES Vth, ſurnamed the wiſe, crowned, 154; declares war againſt Navarre, ib.; againſt England, 169; his army ſucceſsful in taking ſeveral garriſons, 170; return to Paris for its defence, 175; concludes a truce with England, ib.; renews the war on the acceſſion of Richard IId, and deſtroys many ſea port towns in England, 178; two fruitleſs attempts to poiſon him, by Charles, the bad king of Navarre, 180; dies, 188.
CHARLES VIth, a minor, under the care of the dukes of Bourbon and Burgundy, while the regency is in the hands of the duke of Anjou, 203; crowned, 205; goes with an army againſt the Flemings, 221; returns to Paris, 224; his arbitrary judgment, 225; marries Iſabella of Bavaria, 232; a fleet projected to make a deſcent upon England, which is diſperſed by a ſtorm, 236; differs with the duke of Guelders, 240; propoſes to the duke to take the reigns of government, 241; concludes a truce with England, 242; ſends an army againſt the infidels, 245, 246; renews the war with England, 249; to revenge the attempts of Craon to murder his favourite Cliſſon, he arms and follows the culprit into Brittany, 251; ſees a ſpectre in the foreſt of Mans (ſee the plate), 252; becomes inſane and attacks his attendants, but is ſecured, 253; is reſtored to his ſenſes, ib.; attends a maſquerade and is remarkably preſerved, 255; his diſorder returns at intervals for the remaining 30 years of his life, 256; aſſiſts the king of Hungary againſt the Turks, but his army moſtly killed, 259; his dreadful ſituation through negligence, 270; a proof of the attachment of his people to him, 282; convokes a bed of juſtice, 286; heads an army againſt the duke of Burgundy, 300; dies, 342.
CHARLES VIIth, when dauphin, preſerved by the provoſt from the prevailing diſaſters of Paris, and leaves the city, 319; aſſumes the regency during his father's inſanity, and eſtabliſhes a parliament, 322; a conference held to ſettle a peace with England, which Henry makes ſo peremptory, that the dauphin breaks it off, 327; enters into a treaty with the duke of Burgundy, by which they govern the nation in conjunction, 328; procures Burgundy to be maſſacred at an interview, 330; an union of princes to revenge his death, 331; is denounced at Paris as guilty of leze majeſty, and forfeits his eſtates, 335; obtains ſuccours from Scotland, who, under earl Buchan, beats the Engliſh army, and kills the duke of Clarence, 336; his power increaſes, 337; on the death of his father becomes king, the diſaſtrous commencement of his reign, 343, 345; loſes a battle which muſt have defeated all his ſtratagems, but for a favourable incident, 348; obtains Brittany's aſſiſtance, 349; again loſes it by the influence of the Engliſh, 351; beſieges Rheims, 358; Paris, after having been 15 years in the hands of the Engliſh, is again put into his poſſeſſion, 382; his entry, 383; a conſpiracy againſt him, which miſcarries, 385; beſieges Pontoiſe, but after 3 months was forced to abandon it with great loſs, 389; but returns and takes it, 390; a confederacy, 391; quelled without bloodſhed, 392; a truce with England for 6 years, 394; goes againſt the Swiſs at the inſtigation of the emperor, but is ſeverely beat, which promotes a peace, 395; diſbands his troops, 396; taking advantage of the diſturbed ſtate of England, reſolves to drive them from his territory, 399; in 12 months takes all Normandy, 400; and Guienne, 402; Guienne retaken, ib.; refuſes the dauphin's aſſiſtance, 403; entirely deſtroys an Engliſh army under earl Talbut, ib.; take Guienne, 404; a new plot, 407; appoints a bed of juſtice to try the duke of Alencon, who was concerned, ib.; beſieges England, 411; is taken ill, 414; refuſes to take food, from having formed a reſolution to die, which is effected, 415; character, 416; extraordinary dreſſes during his reign.
COURAGE, Lewis XIth's idea of it, 381.

D.

DUNOIS, see Orleans.
DESMARETS John, his character and unjuſt death, 225.
DAUPHIN, see Charles VIIth and Lewis XIth.
DAUPHIN, mortifies Burgundy, 294; is at length forced to give up his adherents to the duke, 295; obtains an army of the duke to enforce his power in the capital, which flies, 299; procures a ſtrong armament againſt Burgundy, 300; treats with him, 302; his change of conduct disgraceful, ib.; dies, 310.

DAUPHIN, dies, 314.

E.

ENGLAND sends the bishop of Norwich with an army to assist the Flemish against France, and takes several towns, 226; not being supplied from England, is forced to abandon them, and return with a shattered army to England, 227; devastations, 187.
EDWARD, prince of Wales, surnamed the black prince, after having been engaged nearly in all the warlike proceedings of his father, Edward IIId, particularly famed for gaining the memorable battles of Crecy and Poictiers, and his generous treatment of prisoners, dies at Westminster, 178.
EDWARD IIId, of England, disputes the crown with Philip VIth, of France, 3; does homage to the king of France, 11; assumes the titles of "vicar of the empire," and "king of France," to obtain the assistance of the vassal princes, 24; marches his army into France, 25; in person commands a fleet of 240 sail, and defeats 400 sail, 27; his troops harrassed, he agrees to a truce, 28; sends a fleet to second the pretensions of count Mountfort to Brittany, 32; after a truce agreed to be for 3 years, but not performed, Edward embarks, and takes the Perigord, 36; lands a powerful army in Normandy, 38; defeats Philip, 43; takes Calais after a tedious siege, and determines to put to death its defenders, but at the representation of its governor desists; he then demands the death of 6 of its principal citizens, but after his nobles and the prince of Wales had solicited in vain to have them spared, his queen prevails on him, 50 (see the plate); fights in single combat with Ribaumont, 51, 52; again invades France, 67 to 77; enters with a formidable army, 132; grants a truce to the duke of Burgundy for 3 years, 134; goes with a strong army into Castile, to oppose the progress of Henry of Transtamare and du Guesclin, 162; quits the title of king of France, 167; dies, 178.
EVENTS, remarkable ones; an hail storm which perhaps was the means of producing peace between the French and English nations, 136.

F.

FRANCE, its situation after its king, John IId, was taken prisoner, 87; a general revolt, 112; a dreadful retort, 114; state in 1364, 149; it's fleet described, 179; state of literature and arts in 1380, 196; ancient government restored, 207; state of the church, 210; its new form of government, 276; crown demanded by Henry Vth, of England, 303; allows Henry to be king, 332; horrid situation, 336; poverty, 342; possessions of the English in France, 343; fresh disasters, 345, 346; useful incident, 348; tranquillity once more established but of no long duration, 396.
FLEMISH, headed by Colin Zannequin, a fisherman, meets Philip VIth in battle, 7; his army totally destroyed after having performed wonders, 8; their count Lewis reinstated, 9; again deprived, 21; defeated by the English, 23; defeated with vast slaughter by Clisson and John de Vienne, 222; assisted by the English, 226.
FASTOLFE, or Falstaff, sir John, gains the famous battle of Herring before Orleans, 352; flies before the maid of Orleans, and looses his honours of the garter, &c. 357.
FAMINE, a dreadful one, 50, 62, 383.
FRIENDSHIP, curious proof of, 270.

G.

GENOA added to the French crown, 258; commotions there, 264.
GUESCLIN, Bertrand du, his intrepidity, 127; appointed to command by John IId, 145; takes Nantes, 149; beats a Navarrese army, 154; Longueville given him, 155; covered with wounds surrenders to Montfort, 158; is appointed to head the banditti, or companies, against king Pedro of Castile, for which his ransom is paid, 163; his progress on the pope's territory, 162; taken by the English, 163; his gracious reception by the princess of Wales, 161 (see the plate); purchases his liberty and raises another army, 164; returns to France and engages the English army with success, 172; resigns his office of constable of France, but on the solicitation of the nobles resumes it, 187; dies, ib.

H.

HENRY Vth, of England, demands the crown of France, which he seconds with a large army, 303; fights the French at Azinecourt, and with about one fourth their number gains a brilliant victory, 309; embarks for England, 305, 309; proposes to negociate but without effect, 313; land again and is joined by the duke of Burgundy, 316; makes amazing progress in Normandy, 317; after repeated successes, at an intercourse for terms of peace, he falls in love with the king of France's daughter, 327; the negociation broke off, he takes Pontoise with vast booty, 328; taking advantage of the general alarm, he obtains encouragement from many towns to aspire to the crown, 332; concludes a treaty with the king, which grants him the crown, 335; his splendour in Paris, 336; returns to England after marrying the princess, ib.; on the defeat of the English army, he returns again to France, 337; his army in want of provisions, and beat, 338; after settling the affairs of France, he dies, 342.
LA HIRE, a French general under Charles VIIth, 343; beat at the battle of Herrings, 352; introduces provisions to Orleans, 354; taken prisoner, but afterward being released, gains a brilliant victory, 378; dies, 392.
HENNEBONNE besieged and bravely defended by Jane, countess of Montfort (see the plate), 32.
HAIL, a dreadful storm which spread desolation, 136.

I.

ISABELLA, queen of Charles VIth, her attachment to and criminal intercourse with her husband's brother, the duke of Orleans, 259; vested with the power during her husband's insanity, her shameful abuse of it, by neglecting him and her children, 265, 267; leaves Paris on the duke of Burgundy's approach, 268; her pomp and luxury amidst the national distress, 270; again flies on the increase of Burgundy's power, and fortifies Melun, 277; returns with a large army to Paris on his flight, and again takes the authority, 278; institutes a bed of justice to try the duke, his sentence, 279; on a victory of the duke over the Liegoes, she again retires from Paris, taking the king and dauphin with her, 280; is caught in her amours by the king, who, after ordering her lover, the Lewis Bourbon, to be drowned, despoils her of her power and property, 315; is released from captivity by an application to Burgundy, 317; arrives in Paris and is kindly received by the king, 320; denounces vengeance on the murderers of the infamous duke of Burgundy, and joins the ſucceeding duke againſt her ſon, afterwards Charles VIIth, 330; dies, 381.

JEWS recalled for 20 years after their baniſhment, 140; reſidence prolonged and many privileges granted, 204; pillaged, their houſes deſtroyed, and papers burnt by the populace, 206.
JOHN IId crowned, 60; unjuſtly and illegally puts the count Eu to death, 61; rejects the propoſals of Edward to give up his pretenſions to the crown of France, 63; convenes the three eſtates, 70; reforms many abuſes, 72; ſeizes Charles the bad, king of Navarre, and ſeveral of his nobles, ſome of whom he decapitates; the king is conducted to Paris, 75; meets the prince of Wales and engages in battle, 81; ſurrenders himſelf priſoner to Dennis de Morbec (ſee the plate), after ſuffering 60,000 men to be burnt by 8000, 84; the prince's generoſity, 85; annuls the decree of the ſtates which raiſes new impoſts, 96; conveyed to England, his entrance there, 97; agrees to terms for his ranſom and the ſecurity of peace, but which appeared ſo unreaſonable, that the regent and nobles of France reject it, 132; is releaſed and returns to Paris, 138; ſends an army againſt a banditti of 16,000 men, but his troops are defeated with great loſs, 143; goes to England, 148; dies in London, 149.

K.

KNOWLES, ſir Robert, marches from Calais with an army againſt the French, but is defeated, 172.

L.

LANGUEDOC, oppreſſive taxes there, 243.
LOMBARDS, the only money lenders except the Jews in the 14th century, 206.
LITERATURE, ſtate of in the 14th century, 198.
LAON, biſhop of (ſee Marcel), eſcapes a juſt death by flight, 121.
LAND, prodigious difference in its value in 1328 and 1762, 5.
LANCASTER, John of Gaunt, duke of, left in France to command the army of Edward IIId, 171; fails to aſſiſt the garriſons in Brittany, 180; beſieges St. Maloes, ib.; marches with an army through Champagne but to no effect, 173; is defeated by the Spaniſh fleet, 171.
LANCE, deſcription of a lance, 145, 396.
LEWIS XIth's noble idea of courage, 381; when dauphin is married, 382; engages in a conſpiracy to take the government, 386, 398; reduced to obedience, 387; makes an unſucceſsful attack upon the Swiſs, 395; marries again, 401; invited to return to court, 404; rebels again and flies, 405; is conſulted by the council on his father's illneſs, 414; on the death of his father he is crowned at Rheims, 424; ſplendid entry into Paris, 425; ſends ſome troops to England with the queen Margaret of Anjou, 430; aſſiſts the king of Arragon againſt the Catalonians, 431; reſolves to attack the duke of Brittany, but an accommodation takes place, 435; diſcontents of the people, 440; a general confederacy formed amongſt the princes, 444; compels the duke of Bourbon to make peace, 446; meets the Burgundian army under Charolois, and after a violent battle ſeperates, 449; enters Paris, 452; an enormous army beſiege Paris, but a truce agreed on; 455; makes a treaty with Brittany, who aſſiſts him to take the province of Normandy from his brother, 464; invites inhabitants to come and reſide in Paris, on account of the numerous deaths there, 469; goes againſt Brittany, 472; treats with Burgundy, 475; on meeting to ſettle the terms he is violently chagrined at a diſcovery of his baſely exciting the Liegois to rebellion, for which he is held priſoner, 478; joins the duke as baſely to quell the Liegois, and has a narrow eſcape, 482; returns to Paris and meets with a mortifying circumſtance, 484; ſtrengthens his intereſt by adviſing his brother's marriage into the king of Caſtile's family, 489; reduces Gaſcony to obedience, 492; goes againſt Brittany, but the ſiege ends in a negociation, 494; after ſome events of miſunderſtanding with Burgundy tranquility is reſtored, 501; after holding a council he renews the war with Burgundy, 506; proſpers, 509; when in certain proſpect of conqueſt, he weakly ſubmits to Burgundy's inſinuation for a truce, 512; diſcovers a plot of his brother Charles's, 513; invaded Guienne, 519; takes it, 523; is accuſed of the murder of his brother, for which Burgundy threatens him, 522; obtains advantages over Burgundy, 524; a truce, 526; his cruelty among numerous other inſtances, 527; plot to poiſon him diſcovered, 529; a ſerious league between the duke of Burgundy and king of England, who demands his crown, 531, 532; Lewis treats him with preſents, and ſigns a truce with both, 534, 536, 538; after the death of Burgundy he makes war with the heireſs of that houſe, and ſpreads devaſtation and ruin before him, 548; increaſes his allies, 553; meets Maximilian, emperor of Germany, but ſoon ſigns a truce, 555; new hoſtilities, 557; after affiancing the dauphin to Maximilian's daughter, a general peace enſues, 559; finding his end approach, gives advice to his ſon, which is drawn from his own deteſtable conduct, 560; ſurrounded with the torments of a guilty conſcience, he ſequeſters himſelf in a miſerable abode, 561, 563; dies, 565; infamous character, 566.

M.

ST. MICHAEL's, military order of, eſtabliſhed, 566.
MONTAGUE, prime miniſter, executed by order of the duke of Burgundy, 283, 292.
MINORITY, at what age the dauphins of France ended it, 176, 254.
MASSACRE, dreadful inſtances of, 9, 37; ſee cruelty.
MONTFORT, count of, aſſerts his right to be duke of Brittany, 29; is ſummoned to Paris, 30; eſcapes but is taken priſoner at Nantes, 32; obtains his releaſe and heads an Engliſh army, 37; dies, ib.
MONTFORT, ſee Brittany.
MONTFORT, Jane counteſs of, after her huſband was taken priſoner, ſhe bravely headed the garriſon at Hennebonne to repel the invaders, ſallies out and burns their camp, 32 (ſee the plate); fights on board the Engliſh fleet, 33; obtains a victory and takes Charles of Blois priſoner, 46.
MARCEL, proveſt of Paris, excites the people to inſurrection, 91, 97; his villainous plan expoſed, 103; his addreſs to the people againſt the dauphin, 104; tumultuouſly enters the regent's apartment and murders his officers, 106; is humbled by the prince's ſuperior ſkill, 112; killed by John Maillard, 120.
MAILLARD John, his ſpirited conduct ſaves the capital, and reinſtates the regent of Charles in his power, 120.

N.

NORMANDY, duke of, is appointed regent of France, 86; calls an aſſembly of the ſtates, 95, 100; aſſerts his authority, 99; Navarre attempts to poiſon him, 102, 176; addreſſes the people of Paris on their violent agitation, 103; loſes his power but reſolves on a change in his affairs, 109; after the plot of Marcel had miſcarried, he re-enters Paris to the general joy of the citizens, 121; a conſpiracy formed in Paris by the king of Navarre againſt his life, 133.

NAVARRE, Charles the bad, king of, maſſacres the favourite of John IId, who in vain attempts to chaſtiſe him, 63, 66; obtains forgiveneſs from John, 67; forms a plot, 68; is ſeized by John, 75; makes his eſcape, 100; repairs to Paris after his partizans had obtained his ſafe paſſport, ib. 101; his power over the dauphin, 102; makes demands on Charles the regent, 105; ſummoned to Paris again, 116; his perfidious treaty with the regent, 117; ſigned a treaty with England againſt France, 122; take many towns, 124; again aſks a treaty, 128; is included under the Engliſh treaty in the general amneſty, 137; poiſons Badſol, a leader of banditti, whom he pretended to engage in his ſervice, 144; renews hoſtilities againſt France, 148; endeavours to engage a jew to poiſon the regent, and on his refuſal has him drowned, 180; dies, 237.

O.

ORIGIN of the uſe of cannon, 44; of the words "Ich Dien," I ſerve in the prince of Wales arms, ib.; of the name of that diſeaſe called St. Anthony's fire, 189; of the woollen cloth manufactory in France, ib.; of the royal library at Paris, 198; making paper in France, 199; of ſpectacles, 198; of the word "Hugonot," 212; of ſtate letters, which ſuſpends all actions during a campaign, 227; of bombs, 419; of printing, 420; of cutting for the ſtone, 567.

ORLEANS, duke of, appointed regent of France during the king's indiſpoſition, 255; unfortunate curioſity, ib.; criminal intercourſe with the queen, 259; impoſes burdenſome taxes, and lives in unrivalled ſplendour, 262, 263; hoſtilities with Burgundy, which is again accommodated on his joint government, 264; new hoſtilities with Burgundy but ends in peace, 270; after a mutual intercourſe Burgundy hires aſſaſſins to murder him, which is effected, 272; character, 271.

ORLEANS, counteſs of, after many fruitleſs attempts to revenge the murder of her huſband, dies, 281.

ORLEANS, duke of, forms a confederacy with the duke of Burgundy againſt the king, 390; is drawn off from it by the king, which proves his downfall, 392; is reproached by the king, 442; dies, ib.

ORLEANS, baſtard of, afterward count Dunois, the ducheſs charges him to revenge his father's death, 281; joins a confederacy againſt the duke of Burgundy, 286; demands juſtice on Burgundy for the murder of his father, 289; is taken priſoner by the Engliſh and not liberated for 25 years, 309; defeats the Engliſh, 350; takes Chartres, 377; enters a conſpiracy againſt the king but repents, 386; takes Mans, 397.

P.

PRAGMATIC ſanction deſcribed, 384, 428.

PHILLIPPA, conſort of Edward IIId, of England, defeats the Scottiſh army and takes their king, 47; repairs to Calais, where ſhe intercedes for the brave garriſon, 48.

POICTIERS, battle of, 81.

POPES, their exactions, 234.

PLOT to burn the fleet, diſcovered, 233; an infamous one diſcovered, 311; to deliver Paris to the dauphin, 341.

PHILIP VIth crowned, 4; annexes Champagne and Brie to his crown, 6; makes war againſt the Flemiſh, ib.; entirely deſtroys their army, 8; maſſacres 10,000 for rebellion, 9; ſettles a diſpute between the clergy and nobility, 11; his troops defeated in Flanders by the Engliſh, who, at the ſolicitation of Robert of Artois, makes war, 21, 23; neither his threats nor the pope's bulls can ſeperate them, 26; his fleet of 400 ſail defeated, and moſtly taken by an Engliſh fleet of 240, 27; obtains the emperor's intereſt, 29; a truce with England for 3 years, 34; his cruelty to ſeveral noblemen of Brittany cauſes complaints, and renews hoſtilities, 35; Philip attacks a powerful army and is defeated, 43; dies, 56.

PARIS, dreadful ſtate of it, 118, 120, 206, 318; inſurrection there, 214, 318; diſtempers, 468; after being 15 years in the hands of the Engliſh, is delivered up to Charles VIIth, 382.

R.

ROUEN, an inſurrection there, 213; extraordinary reſolution of its inhabitants to preſerve the town, 326; a ſtratagem to deliver it, which failed, 376.

RICHARD IId, of England, marries Iſabella, daughter to Charles VIth, 257; is depoſed and Henry IVth aſcends the throne, 261.

RICHEMONT, count of, joins the French army with his troops on an offer of the conſtable's ſword, 344, 348; by his influence with the duke of Brittany he obtains aſſiſtance for Charles, 349; makes an unſucceſsful ſiege of Pontorſon, ib.; obtains his releaſe from England, where he had been taken priſoner on condition to join the duke of Brittany, 338; enters Paris, 382; takes Meaux, 384; ſucceeds to the dukedom of Brittany on that nobleman's death, 411; dies, ib.

S.

SWISS in defence of their liberties attacks the confederated armies of France, Germany and England, and beats them with great ſlaughter, 395.

STEWART arrives from Scotland with an army, who fights againſt the Engliſh, is defeated and taken but exchanged for Pole, 345; promoted, 346.

SIGISMUND, emperor of Germany, pretends to negociate peace, meanwhile he enters into treaty to aſſiſt England, 314.

STRATAGEM, a cruel one, 246.

SUPERSTITION, uncommon inſtance, 58.

SIEGE of Journay, 28; Calais, 45, 48; Rheims, 133; Saint Malo, 180; Ghent, 218, 219; Dam, 233; Harfleur, 313; Cherburg, 323; Rouen, 325; Chateau Gailland, ib.; Meaux, 339, 340; Orleans, 351 to 356; Compeigne, 365; Lagny, 377; Caſtillon, 403; Beauvois, 524; Perpignon, 534.

T.

LE TREMOILE recommmend to king Charles as a favourite, is made prime miniſter, 349; a conſpiracy formed againſt him, 379; diſplaced, ib.; forms a plot againſt the king, and puts the dauphin at the head, 385; it miſcarries but he is pardoned, 387.

TAXES, people oppoſe paying them, 204; impoſts aboliſhed but reſtored and increaſed, 206.

V.

VIENNE John de, the brave defender of Calais, obliged to ſurrender, 48; with a fleet ravages the Engliſh coaſts, and burns ſeveral ſea ports, 178; goes againſt the Flemings, 220; makes great ſlaughter, 222.

W.

WIFE, the duke of Brittany's idea of the neceſſary qualifications of one, 393.

WARWICK, earl of, arrives in France, being baniſhed England, 499.

WILD, John, boldly defends Liege, 480.